SCINDE, or SINDE, a country of N.W. India, now annexed to the British presid. Bombay, watered by the lower Indus, and comprising its delta, extending from the Indian Ocean in lat. 23° 32' N. northward to the junction of the Chenab with the Indus, in lat. 28° 50' N., and between lon. 66° 37' and 71° 16' E., having S.E. Cutch, E. the Indian desert and Bhawpoo, and W. Afghanistan and Beloochistan. Length N. to S. about 380 m., greatest breadth, 300 m. Area 60,000 sq. m. Pop. 1,000,000. It presents in some respects, a remarkable similarity to Egypt, being a plain divided by a large river, and bounded on one side by mntns., and on the other by a desert; but though fertile on the river banks, it is far inferior in productiveness, population, and civilization to the valley of the Nile. The delta is encumbered with jungle and tall grass; and the lands bordering it are poor, destitute of fresh water, and after the inundation of a dry clay, incrustated with salt. Upper Scinde is the most fertile part of the country, being irrigated by canals, and yielding rice, wheat, barley, oil-seeds, millet, opium, indigo, maize, sugar-cane, cotton, pulse, and esculent vegetables, with dates, mangoes, plantains, and the fruits common to S. Europe. Much of the country has, however, been depopulated by the Ameers, and laid waste for hunting grounds. Mimosas, banyans, palms, and mangroves are amongst the principal trees. Camels, buffaloes, sheep, goats, horses, and asses are the domestic animals; wool is an important product, and is manufactured into bags, ropes, and strong cloths. Climate extremely sultry and dry; at Hyderabad the thermometer has been found to stand in the shade at 98°.5, during a part of the day for six months of the year, and epidemic diseases are frequent, & destructive. Tigers, hyenas, wolves, and other formidable animals are numerous, and alligators swarm in the pools of the delta. Coarse cloths, felt, mats, arms, leather, & horse furniture, earthenwares, cotton, silk, and embroidered fabrics, are made in the towns, but few manufactured goods are fitted for exportation; the exports consisting chiefly of the natural produce, rice and other grains, ghee, hides, fish, wool, salt, and nitre from the soil, oil and oil seeds, bark, alkalies, firewood, opium, tobacco, camels and horses. Imports are chiefly manufactures, madder and other dyes, groceries, metals, gems, timber, cordage, bamboos, and dried fruits. Kurrachee, at the mouth of the Indus, is the chief port and seat of foreign trade. The inhabitants are partly Hindoos, partly Beloochees, and Mohammedans, the lower classes of the latter being of the soonee, & the upper or ameer of the shiah sect. Until lately the country was governed by the ameer, who exercised an aristocratic military despotism; but after open hostilities had been evinced by them against the British, their power was completely broken by the forces under Sir C. Napier in 1844, and Scinde became a British dependency. Chief towns, Hyderabad the cap., Shikarpoor, Khyerpoor, Kurrachee, Tattah, Meerpoor, Halla, Larkhana, and Roree.

Principal town Kastro, on its E. coast. SCOTLAND, the northern portion of Great Britain, extends in its mainland from lat. 54° 38' to 58° 41' N., and lon. 1° 45' to 6° 14' W., and including its islands, to lat. 60° 50' N., and lon. 8° 35' W. It is separated from England by a waving line of the Cheviot hills in the centre, by the Tweed, which enters the sea at Berwick, on the E., and by the Solway Firth on the W. Its eastern shores are washed by the North Sea, and its western by the Atlantic. It is of an oblong irregular form, extending longitudinally due N. and S. 280 m., and varying in breadth from 175 to 100, 50, and 30 m. Estimated area, including islands, 28,896 sq. m., or 18,944,000 ac., of which 5,043,450 ac. are cultivated, 13,900,550 uncultivated, and 638 sq. m. are occupied by lakes and rivers. Pop. (1801) 1,599,068, (1841) 2,620,184. The greater part of the surface is irregularly distributed into mountain and valley, a very small proportion extending into level plains. The eastern side is bounded by a well defined continuous waving line of coast, indented by the 4 estuaries of the Forth, Tay, Moray, and Dornoch Firths. The W. line again is exceedingly irregular, being broken up by innumerable headlands and bays, and thickly studded with islands of various magnitudes. The Solway Firth, the Firth of Clyde, Loch Fine, Loch Linnhe, Loch Carron, & Loch Broom, are here among the most conspicuous estuaries and bays. Scotland is divided into the Lowlands, comprehending that portion S. of the Tay, and the low country all along the E. and N.E. coasts, and the Highlands comprehending the Central and Western and N. Western portions. The middle or Alpine region is the most elevated portion, and in general the greatest elevation of land exists towards the W. and N. coasts, while the country slopes gradually towards the E. The Grampian ranges of mountains, commencing with Ben Nevis, S.W. corner of Inverness-shire, extend in a N.E. direction, intersecting the whole breadth of Scotland to near the E. shores in Aberdeenshire, and forming, with their offsets, an extensive mountain chain, with elevations varying from 4,375 to 3,000 and 2,000 feet. This Central Alpine region extends S. to the Tay, and N. and N.W. to the borders of the Moray Firth. The great valley of the Caledonian canal separates this middle region into two, but a continuation of the same Alpine mtns. extends also throughout Sutherlandshire, terminating at Cape Wrath. Granite, porphyry, primary schists, marble, and quartz rock, with occasionally metallic veins, form the strata of the district, while the old red sandstone formation fills up the valleys and the coast line on each side N. and S. of the Grampian mountains, extending, with the exception of the E. part of Aberdeenshire, along the whole coasts of Scotland, both E. and W. sides, from the Tay and Clyde N.wards. The middle portion of Scotland, from St Andrews to St Abb's head, and in corresponding lines westward to Dumbarton, comprehends the great coalfield of Scotland, intersected by the greenstone ranges of the Ochil mountains on the N., and the Lanarkshire hills, Pentlands, and Fife Lomonds, in the centre. Another coal district extends also into Berwickshire, and part of Roxburgh, while the whole region from the Lammermoor range S. and W. into Peebles, Dumfriesshire, and Wigtonshire, is composed of the lower Silurian or greywacke formation. Limestone and ironstone are found in the coal districts, lead ore in the Greywacke districts of Leadhills, silver in the Ochil mountains, and lead and antimony and manganese in the primary range of the Grampians. Traces of oolitic strata are found in the North and in the Western islands. The Cheviot mountains (which see) separate Scotland from England. The principal rivs. in Scotland are the Tweed, Forth, Tay, N. and S. Esks, Dee, Don, Spey, Deveron, Lossie, Findhorn, Ness, Conon, Brora, Wick, and Helmsdale, on the eastern side; the Nith, Annan, Dee, Cree, Ayr, Doone, Clyde, on the S. and W.; while no conspicuous rivers flow into the ocean on the Western or N. Western coasts. Lakes are numerous, and many of them famed for picturesque beauty. Loch Lomond, Loch Awe, Loch Tay, Loch Ness, Loch Maree, are the most extensive, and all these, and several others, are noticed under separate heads. The islands consist of the Orkney, Hebrides, and Shetland groups, also separately noticed. The climate of Scotland varies according to the locality. The W. & S. parts are mild, but humid; the central elevated regions chill and humid, the eastern plains and Lowlands more genial, though exposed in spring to chill E. winds. In the Lowlands the summer is not so hot, but the winter is, on the whole, milder than that of England, and the climate is reckoned salubrious, and favourable to longevity. The following table exhibits the mean annual temperature of several localities:—

	Mean of winter.	Mean of summer.	Mean of Year.	Rain in inches.
	Deg.	Deg.	Deg.
Edinburgh, .	38.4	57.3	47.1	24.

Mean annual temp. of mainland 47°.9 Fahr. Prevailing winds W. and S.W.; in spring N. and N.E. Most rain falls on the W. coasts. The central W. and N.W. districts of Scotland are chiefly grazing and pastoral, the valleys and plains of the E. and S. districts agricultural. The alluvial, or carse lands of Stirling, Falkirk, and Gowrie, the plains of the Lothians & Clydesdale, portions of Fife, Berwick, and Roxburgh-shires, in the S., and Moray and Ross-shires in the N., are the most fertile and most highly cultivated soils in Britain, where all the usual agricultural products are raised. Landed property is in fewer hands than in England. Farms almost universally on leases, varying in extent from 50 to 1,000 ac., and pasture farms extend to 3,000 and 5,000 ac. Farming, since the middle of last century, has arrived at a high degree of perfection. Supposed annual rental of Scotland (1845) 6,000,000*l.* Total annual value of agricultural and pastoral land produce 29,327,144*l.* The rent of arable land ranges from 7*s.* to 3*l.* and 5*l.* per acre. Except in the greater preponderance of Alpine plants, the flora of Scotland resembles very much that of England. There are about 3,230 indigenous plants. Extensive pine forests, both natural and artificially planted, abound, & the usual fruit trees thrive well. The wild animals are the same as those in England. Grouse and ptarmigan abound in the moors, but the capercailzie (Tetrao Uragallus), formerly abundant, was exterminated about 1760. The English nightingale is unknown in Scotland. Salmon and trout abound in the rivers, and herrings, cod, haddocks, and other fish, in the surrounding seas. Manufactures of cotton, linen, and woollen goods are extensively carried on in Scotland. In 1839, there were 676 mills or factories in operation, employing 59,124 persons. Value of cotton goods annually produced estimated at 5,000,000*l.* Coal & iron working, ship-building, coach-building, glass & stone ware manufactures and whisky distilling, are among the other branches extensively pursued. About 6 million galls. whisky, duty upwards of 1,080,000*l.*, are annually produced. Total quantity of herrings cured in 1840, 543,945 barrels, of cod and ling 93,560 barrels. Total number of persons employed in fisheries 88,718. Annual value of salmon fisheries 150,000*l.* Nett revenue of customs, excise stamps, post-office, and property tax of Scotland for 1844, 5,829,668*l.* There are excellent roads through all parts of the country, & railway communication to all the leading towns S. of Aberdeen. In 1849, 750 m. of railway were opened. The principal canals are the Forth and Clyde and Union Canal, the Crinan and Caledonian canals. Chief towns, Edinburgh the capital, Glasgow, Perth, Dundee, Aberdeen, Dumfries, and Inverness. In each of the cos. are a lord-lieutenant, a sheriff-depute and substitute, & local justices. The courts of session and judiciary exercise the supreme jurisdiction. [EDINBURGH.] The Roman Catholic religion was abolished in Scotland in 1560, when the Calvinistic Presbyterian form of church government was established by John Knox, consisting of local presbyteries and synods, and a general assembly, which meets annually in Edinburgh. Since 1712 the right of appointing to livings is vested in the crown or in private patrons. A secession, on account of patronage, took place in 1741. In 1834 the Veto Act passed the General Assembly, modifying the right of patronage; but this act having been overthrown by Parliament, a disruption took place in 1843 of 470 clergymen, and the Free Church was formed. The older seceders, now called United Presbyterians, form a numerous body; and there are Roman Catholics, & a small proportion of Episcopalians; dissenters forming altogether about 2-3ds of the whole population. There are 1,023 parishes in Scotland and its islands, and 1,050 clergymen of the establishment. There is an endowed school in each pa., besides numerous other schools and academies, 5 universities, and several theological colleges and schools of medicine. From 1-8th to 1-10th of the pop. are calculated to be receiving education. Caledonia was the ancient name of Scotland, and the earliest inhabitants were Celtic, but at various periods colonies of Teutonic origin made descents upon and settled in the lowlands and central highlands of Scotland. Such probably were the Picts about the third century, and the Attacotti or Scoti from Ireland several centuries later. These latter gave their name to the whole country. The N.W. parts of Scotland and the Hebrides are still peopled by the Celtic race. That part S. of the Tay and Clyde, and the whole eastern coasts, including Caithness, are Saxon and Scandinavian. The central parts are a mixture of Saxon and Celtic. Erse or Gaelic, the language of the aboriginal Celts, is still spoken in the highlands. The old Scottish language is a cognate Teutonic dialect; it is now generally superseded by the modern English; though it will live in the works of Ramsay, Burns, and Scott.

Scotland, previously an independent kingdom, was joined to England in 1603, on this accession of James VI., and a legislative union of the two kingdoms took place in 1707. By this treaty 16 peers, elected from the whole body of Scottish peers, represented the country in the House of Lords; and the cos. returned 30 and the bors. 15 members to the House of Commons. In 1832 the bor. members were increased to 23. The elective franchise nearly corresponds to that of England. [BRITAIN.]

SEVERN, one of the principal rivers of England and Wales, rises in Montgomeryshire, in a small lake on the E. side of Plimlimmon, 1,500 ft. above the sea, flows at first generally N.E. until it enters England, and then successively S.E. and S. through Shropshire, Worcestershire, & Gloucestershire, and between Somersetshire and S. Wales, to its expansion into the Bristol Channel, 12 m. S.W. Bristol. Total length estimated at 210 m. Principal affs., the Terne, Upper and Lower Avon, Leyden, Chilt, and Frome, from the E., and the Terne, Wye, Usk, and Taf, from the W., many of which pour themselves into its estuary. From Newtown it has a total descent of 465 feet to the sea. It traverses a very fertile country, and is navigable from the sea to Welshpool, a distance of nearly 180 m. Barges ascend it as high as Bewdley, but its navigation is both tedious and difficult, to obviate which a canal, 18½ m. in length, has been cut from Gloucester to the sea, and is navigable for vessels of 350 tons. From Welshpool to Newtown, its navigation is continued by the Montgomery canal, and other canals connect it with the Thames, Trent, Mersey, and most other rivers of Central England. Four weirs or locks, between Stourport & Diglis, near Worcester, have been constructed. The tide, here termed the eagre, or bore, rushes into the Severn with such violence, that the stream sometimes rises suddenly 9 feet in height at Gloucester, and extensive embankments have accordingly been formed below that city, to obviate the effects of its irruption. The tide is perceptible in the Severn as far as Diglis, below Worcester, 120 m. from its mouth. At its junction with the British Channel, the Severn is 10 m. across, and drains about 6,000 sq. m. The vessels engaged in the Shropshire trade are from 30 to 40 tons burden, in the lower parts of the river they range from 100 to 140 tons, and by far the greater part of the commerce is carried on between Gloucester and the sea. Tolls received in 1847 by the Severn commission on account of improvements 12,567*l*.

It is surrounded by Moorish walls about 5 m. in circuit, having numerous gates and towers, and the ramparts forming public walks; its interior has almost wholly an oriental appearance; streets mostly narrow lanes, but the Alameda in its centre is a magnificent thoroughfare, planted with elms, and decorated with fountains and statues, and of late years many new streets have been laid out in straight lines, and with regular and handsome residences. The cathedral, a structure of the 14th and 15th centuries, occupies the site of a mosque, & is the largest & finest church in Spain. It is 400 feet in length by 263 feet in breadth, & has a famous square tower—the Giralda, 337 ft. in height, and surmounted by a colossal bronze statue of Faith. The interior is still most richly adorned, though many of its treasures were removed by the French, & it has numerous chapels, pictures by Murillo, & other great artists, magnificent organs, and the tomb in which the remains of Columbus (now in the cathedral of Havana, Cuba) were first deposited. Around this edifice are the archbishop's palace, the chapter counting house, the alcázar, & the exchange in which are the archives of Spanish America. The Alcazar, a royal palace and gardens constructed in imitation of the Alhambra at Granada, contains the "court of Lions," perhaps the best piece of Arabic architecture in Spain, the magnificent hall of ambassadors, royal apartments, with many fine paintings, &c., & dwellings which are let out to private individuals or for lodging houses. Before the French revolutionary invasion, Sevilla is reported to have contained 140 pa. churches, besides numerous convents, most of which are now converted to other purposes, since, in 1845 it had only 31 churches. The royal tobacco and cigar factory is a huge edifice which employs 3,000 hands, principally females. Other principal buildings, are 29 monasteries, 35 convents, 11 hospitals, the city hall, barracks, prisons, theatres, the cannon foundry, arsenal, and in the centre of the city the plaza de toros, or bull-ring, enclosed by edifices of Moorish architecture, & capable of containing 14,000 spectators. The Torre d'Oro is an octagon tower, probably of Roman construction; a Roman aqueduct still conveys water to the city from Alcalá; and here are other remains of classic antiquity. Around the city are many fine public walks, and on one side is the Quemadero, or "burning place of the Inquisition," near which are a large city cemetery, and an English burying-ground. The suburb Triana, beyond the river, is inhabited chiefly by gipsies and smugglers, and near it is a Moorish dam, erected to prevent the effects of inundations to which the lower parts of the city are liable. Sevilla is the residence of a captain-general, and the seat of a royal audiencia, and of a university establishment in what was formerly a Jesuit college, and in which and the city museum are many fine paintings. It has a lyceum, a gunnery, and other public schools, and scientific associations. Its manufs. of silks are important, and it has other manufs. of woollen and linen cloths, hats, combs, soap, and earthenwares, some large leather factories, government iron foundries, and nitre factories, an active fishery in the river, a large coasting trade, and considerable exports of oranges, olives, and oil, extensively raised in the vicinity, the oranges being chiefly sent to England. The Guadalquivir is navigable up to the city for vessels of 100 tons burden; ships drawing more than 10 feet water load and unload 8 m. below the city. Chief imports are manufactured goods from England, hides, hemp, and flax from the Baltic, iron from Bilbao, and colonial produce from Cuba, &c. The Goths removed their capital from Sevilla to Toledo in the 6th century. The city was taken by the Moors in 711, and by Frederick II. in 1247, after which, until the time of Philip V., it was the chief residence of the Spanish monarchs. The French took it in 1810 and 1823. A few miles distant, on the W., is the vill. Santa Ponce, the ancient Italica, the birthplace of the emperors Trajan, Hadrian, and Theodosius the Great, and where are the remains of a Roman amphitheatre, and other vestiges of antiquity. Santa Ponce and Triana are the seats of large annual fairs.

SHETLAND, or ZETLAND ISLANDS, an archipelago of about 30 islands, in the N. Atlantic O., belonging to Scotland, of which country, with the Orkneys, 50 m. S.S.W., it forms a co.; mostly between lat. 59° 51' and 60° 50' N., and lon. 0° 44' and 1° 44' W., 180 m. S.E. the Faroe group, and 210 m. W. Bergen in Norway. Area 5,588 sq. m. Pop. 30,568. Mainland, in the S.W., comprises about half the area, and more than half the entire pop., together with Lerwick and Scalloway, the only towns in the group. Other islands are Yell, Unst, Fetlar, Whalsey, Bressay, E. & W. Barra, Papa-Stour, Foula, the most N. (and conjectured to be the Ultima Thule of the ancients), and Fair Isle, intermediate between Shetland and Orkney. Shores rocky, and greatly indented with inlets, especially in Mainland. Climate very damp and variable, but snow or frost seldom lasts long in winter, at which season the aurora borealis is highly brilliant; night is scarcely known during May, June, and July. Gneiss, mica-schist, hornblende, and other slate, serpentine, primitive limestone, are the principal rocks. Surface generally mntous., covered with heath, destitute of trees; and the valleys in Mainland, which all extend N. and S., are interspersed with many small lakes. Soil mostly light gravelly, and less productive than that of Orkney. Unst is the most fertile island. Lands are in numerous small, and about 20 large, estates, the largest belonging to the E. of Zetland. Leases are uncommon, and agriculture is accordingly in the most backward condition; the surface is chiefly appropriated to rearing live stock, though some potatoes, turnips, and oats are raised. The cattle and horses are of small breeds, almost peculiar to Shetland; and many of the latter especially, being hardy and well-shaped little animals, have been of late years imported into England, especially to the coal pits in the N. cos., since the labour of women there has been prohibited. The sheep and hogs are also good. The cod, ling, & tusk fisheries are highly important, employing a great proportion of the inhabs. Some copper, iron, and clay are met with; but few mines or quarries are wrought. Chromate of iron, or chrome yellow, is, however, an important article of export from Unst. Manufs. are almost wholly domestic, chiefly Shetland hosiery and shawls, woven by hand from fine wool; other exports cattle, fish, &c., sent S. in return for colonial and manufactured goods; besides which, there is some contraband import of tobacco, spirits, &c., from the Dutch vessels that frequent Shetland. Bearmeal, oatmeal, fish and potatoes, constitute most part of the food of the people, who appear to be, as to their condition and education, better off than the pop. of the N. portion of the mainland of Scotland. They are chiefly of Norwegian descent, and their ancestors are said not to have embraced christianity until the 13th century. The isls. form a synod of the Scottish church, and, together with Orkney, they send 1 mem. to H. of C. Reg. elects. (1848) 174. Scandinavian antiquities are numerous in the islands, and on Fetlar are the vestiges of a Roman camp. [NEW SOUTH SHETLAND.]

It is intersected by a rivulet, and divided into an upper and a lower town, the former chiefly inhabited by Turks, & containing numerous mosques, some new barracks, and a town-clock, having a bell which strikes the hours,—a circumstance unique in Turkey. SIAM, a country of S.E. Asia, Further India, of which it occupies the centre and S. parts, extending between lat. 7° and 19° or 20° N., and lon. 98° and 106° E., nearly enclosing the Gulf of Siam on the S., and having W. the Indian Ocean and British Tenasserim provs., E. the Menam-Kong river separating it from Anamese Camboja, and

N. the independent Laos country. Area estim. at 190,000 sq. m., and pop. at 3,000,000, of whom about 500,000 are Chinese. The Menam river, one of the largest in S.E. Asia, traverses its centre from N. to S., and the region it waters, as also the S.E. part of the country, is highly fertile; but other parts are rugged and mtnous., and on the W. and E. Siam-proper appears to be separated respectively from the Tenasserim coast, and Laos and Camboja by lofty mountain chains. The kingdom comprises the W. half of Camboja, and the isthmus connecting the Malay peninsula with the Asiatic continent. Climate is said to be salubrious. Mean temp. of the year at Bang-kok 83° Fahr. Rice is raised in great abundance, and is the chief food of the people; sugar, pepper, tobacco, cocca-nuts, sago, the finest tropical fruits, teak, sandal, sapan, rose and other woods, coffee, cotton, rattans, & numerous gums, with gold from washings, copper, iron, and gems, are amongst the chief products. The elephant, rhinoceros, tiger, buffalo, leopard, antelopes, and bears, abound in great numbers; and one of the titles of the Siamese monarch is "lord of white elephants." The Siamese are a peculiar race of the Mongolian family, average height 5 feet 2 inches. In bodily and mental energy they are inferior to the Chinese or neighbouring nations; they have made small progress in useful or ornamental arts, and most of the manufs. and handicrafts in the towns are carried on by Chinese or Anamese settlers. Only two roads of any consequence exist in the country; one from Bang-kok to Yuthia, and the other in the E. from Chantibon to Fung-gai; but a navigable canal connects the Menam and Menam-kong rivers. Trade with China, Anam, Camboja, Tonquin, Java, Singapore, and the E. Archipelago, is considerable; and there is occasionally a direct intercourse with Bombay and Surat, England and America. Silver and cowries are the only medium of traffic. Government an absolute monarchy, and the people are in a most servile condition. There is no standing army, but every male subject is liable to serve for a portion of the year. A numerous force of war-junks and galleys is kept up, and manned by Chinese and other foreigners. Buddhism, of a degraded kind, is the religion of the state. Slavery is common. Public revenue has been estimated at upwards of 3,100,000*l.* a-year, which the expenditure nearly balances. The first intercourse with Europeans took place in 1611, and the first British ship reached Bang-kok in 1612. In 1683, a Greek named Phalcon was raised to the dignity of foreign minister of Siam, and opened a communication with France; but the French were expelled from the country in 1690; since that time the conquest of a part of Camboja has formed the chief event of Siamese history.—The Gulf of Siam, between lat. 7° and 14° N., and lon. 99° and 105° E., is wholly surrounded by Siam, except on the S., where it opens into the China Sea. Length 500 miles; breadth at entrance 300 m. It receives the Menam and several other rivers.

Area estimated at 5,393,250 sq. m., and pop. at 2,937,066, of whom about half are Mohammedans & pagans. The cold of winter is extreme, from 20° to 72° below zero of Fahr., while the summer heat is excessive. Surface in the S. elevated by the Altai chain, covered with forests, and interspersed with many fertile valleys; but by far the greater portion of Siberia is flat and sterile. In the W. are extensive steppes, inhabited by Cosack tribes, or roving Kirghiz, and all the N. half is a vast desert peopled by Ostiaks, Yakuts, Tchuktchi, and other tribes in the lowest state of barbarism. The Obi, Yenisei, and Lena rivers, with their large and numerous tributaries, and the Olenek, Indighirka, and Kolyma traverse the country in a N. direction, and enter the Arctic Ocean. Principal lakes are those of Baikal, Tchany, & Sumy, with the Balkash-Nor, or Lake Tenghiz, which forms a part of its S. boundary. In the more populated dists., corn sufficient for the pop. is raised; it is chiefly barley, oats, and buck-wheat. Cattle are numerous in some parts, and in the N. rein-deer, foxes, martens, beavers, and bears, the skins of which compose important articles of trade. Siberia is, however, chiefly valuable to Russia, on account of its minerals.

Its old divisions into Val Demone, V. di Noto, and V. di Mazzara, are now obsolete, and it is subdivided into the following provs. or intencencies.

The Neptunian or Madonian mntns., stretching from E. to W. through the N. part of the isl., consist of granite, quartz, and mica, flanked, as in the Apennines, by limestone and other calcareous formations; they rise to several thousand feet in height, and cover a great part of the surface with their ramifications. In some parts are mntns. isolated from the rest, the chief of which is Mount Etna, near the E., 10,872 feet above the sea. The principal plains border the sea, and are those of Catania and Syracuse in the E., that adjoining Trapani in the W., and those of Milazzo, and Terranova. Rivers all small, and unnavigable; the chief are the Giarretta, watering the plain of Catania, the Salso, Platani, Belici, flowing to the S. coast. The chief lakes are Biviere or Lentini, near the E. coast, and the pool of Enna in the centre of the isl. Soil everywhere of high fertility, in some places it consists of a rich loam from 20 to 30 feet deep. Climate generally salubrious, except in some of the low lands. Mean temp. of the year, at Catania 67° .4, winter 52° .8, summer 84° .5; at Palermo, year 61° .1, winter 52° .5, summer 74° .4 Fahr.; summer heats are oppressive; snow is never seen, except on Etna, and the highest points of the Madonian mntns.; and the cold of winter is never so severe as to affect the verdure of the country. The papyrus, sugar-cane, date palm, and other tropical products ripen at a height of 600 feet; evergreens flourish at 2,000 feet, oak & chestnut woods cover the mntn. sides to the height of 4,000 feet, wheat thrives at 4,500 feet, and beech woods prevail to 6,000 feet in elevation. Under the Romans, Sicily was considered the granary of Italy, but owing to oppressive exactions and restrictions, there are few countries in which agriculture is so ill conducted, and it is stated that instead of corn, nearly one-third of the pop. derive their subsistence mainly from the fruit of the Indian fig, a species of cactus which grows wild in profusion. Lands chiefly belong to the nobility, the clergy, or the crown. Wheat and barley are exported in small quantities. Other chief crops are beans, pulse, maize, rice, olive oil, oranges, lemons, almonds, and other fruits, potatoes, tobacco, flax, hemp, sumach, liquorice, and manna. Silk is produced chiefly in the N.E. part of the isl., and woven at Catania; in the W. 30,000 pipes of wine are annually made, of which from 18,000 to 20,000 are exported by English & other merchants at Marsala. Pastoral industry receives little attention, and except a few merino sheep, and good mules, all kinds of live stock are very inferior. The sulphur beds of Sicily are of the highest importance; they extend over the centre and the S., in an area of 2,700 sq. m., in which about 150 mines are wrought, some at Riesi by an English company, and workmen from Great Britain. The sulphur is found in tertiary formations, and the increase in its production within a few years had been so rapid, that in 7 months of 1838, nearly 77,800 tons were yielded, and this branch of industry employed 12,200 men and boys. In 1838, a monopoly in the export of sulphur was granted by the Neapolitan government to a French mercantile firm, which resulted in such a diminution in the general trade of Sicily, that after a vigorous remonstrance from the British government, it was quashed in 1842, and trade is again on the increase. Alum, nitre, salt, bitumen, gypsum, and marble, are valuable mineral products; ores of copper, lead, iron, & mercury are found in the mntns., but few mines are wrought there, and nearly all metallic goods are imported. The tunny, sword-fish, and anchovy fisheries are important, and those of Palermo lately employed from 900 to 1,000 boats, and 3,500 fishermen. The coral fishery on the African coast is frequented by many fishermen from Trapani, where the coral procured is polished. Silk manufs. at Catania, Palermo, Messina, employ several hundred looms; and in the same cities hides and skins are dressed. At Trapani are some cotton factories wrought by steam; other manufs. are unimportant. Chief exports, sulphur, olive oil, oranges, and lemons, wine and spirits, sumach, silks, and corn, barilla, essences, salted fish, luseed, manna, rags, and skins. Imports sugar and other colonial produce, cotton & other manufactured goods, hides, iron, deals, & wax. Messina, Palermo, Trapani, & Catania, are the chief seats of commerce. Each intendency is governed by a prefect with a council and secretary. Each town has its judicial court; superior courts are in Palermo, Messina, and Catania; and a supreme court sits in Palermo, the cap. Except about 58,000 inhabs. of Greek descent, mostly near Palermo, and several thousand Jews, the inhabs. are all Roman Catholics. In 1832, there were 658 monasteries in the isl. Education is chiefly in the hands of the clergy, and is said to be better conducted than in S. Italy. Palermo and Catania have universities; there are colleges and academies in 21 towns, & a primary and secondary school in each commune. In Catania there are schools of mutual instruction. This island was, in ancient times, the seat of many flourishing Greek colonies, of which Syracuse and Agrigentum were the most famous. It fell successively under the Carthaginians, Romans, Goths, Greek emperors, Saracens, Normans, French, Spaniards, &c.; it was annexed to Naples in 1736. In 1847, 1848, and 1849, attempts were made by the Sicilians to shake off the Neapolitan government. Messina was bombarded & taken by the Neapolitan troops 7th September 1848, and Catania 6th April 1849. [NAPLES.]

 quarter; and the Turks occupy all the upper parts of the city, having between them and the Armenians two close quarters inhabited by the Jews. Principal edifices, the bazaar & market-

Berkshire, and W. Wilts and Dorset. Area, including the Isle of Wight, 1,625 sq. m., or 1,040,000 ac., of which 900,000 are estimated to be under culture. Inhab. houses (1841) 66,617. Pop. 355,004. The ranges of the N. & S. downs traverse the co., being on the W. offsets from the table-land of Salisbury plain, and on the E. contiguous with the downs of Sussex and Surrey. In the S. are the extensive bays Southampton-water and the harbours of Portsmouth and Langston, with the islets of Portsea and Hayling. The S.W. division of the co. is mostly occupied by the New Forest. In other parts are the forests of Bere, Hants Holt, Woolmer, &c., and most parts of the co. are well wooded. A long and narrow strip is enclosed by the co. Sussex. In the N., N.E., and W., are extensive heaths. Soil generally well cultivated. S. Hants is particularly noted for its rural and maritime beauty. Principal rivers, the Anton, Itchin, Avon, and Stour. All the usual crops are raised; hops are cultivated on the E. border, near Farnham; large quantities of cider are made, and the bacon of the co. is in repute. Manufs., except those connected with the dock and shipping establishments at Portsmouth, are of little importance. Some silks are made at Winton; paper, sacking, shalloons, bombazines, ruggets, linseys, and other woollen stuffs, chiefly in the N., and salt from pans at Lynton. Gosport, on the border of Sussex, has some famous oyster beds. The Basingstoke canal is in the N.E., and the co. is intersected by the London & S. Western railway, with several branches, and the South coast railway, terminating at Portsmouth. Trade centres chiefly at Southampton & Portsmouth. Co. rev. (1848) 78,623*l*. The co. is subdiv. into 39 hundreds, and is included in the W. diocese and diocese of Winchester, the cap.; besides which it contains the par. bors. Southampton, Portsmouth, Christchurch, Lynton, Petersfield, & the market towns Gosport, Alresford, Itou, Basingstoke, Fordingbridge, Lynton, Bristchurch, Romsey, and Ringwood. The co. sends 4 mems. to H. of C. Reg. electors in 1846, 18 r. N. division, 3,411; S. div. 5,812; total, 9,223. The ruined city of Silchester in the N., Porchester with its ancient castle in the S., and Carisbrooke castle, in the Isle of Wight, are amongst the principal antiquities, besides those in Winchester, the ancient cap. of the kingdom Wessex, and of England during the Saxon, Norman, and early Plantagenet dynasties.

SOUTHAMPTON, a par. and munic. bor., seaport town, and co. of England, in the S. part of the co. Hants, occupying a peninsula betw. the mouths of the Test and Itchin rivers, at the head of Southampton-water, 12 m. S.S.W. Winchester, and the South Western railway, 72 m. S.W. London. Lat. of St Michael's spire, 50° 54' N., lon. 1° 24' 2" W. Area of bor. and co. 1,970 ac. Pop. 349,000. Its external appearance, especially from distance at sea, is highly prepossessing. On the road it is entered by a noble avenue of trees; and its main street, upwards of 1 m. in length, equals in beauty almost any in London, and is separated into two parts by the Bar-gate, a portion of the ancient walls, which still partially enclose the old town. Over the Bar-gate is the town hall; other principal structures are several churches, the audit & custom houses, theatre, public baths, two sets of assembly rooms, dock company's office, railway station, three piers, and the cavalry barracks. The suburbs are extensive and increasing. Around are many elegant villas, and the town is well supplied with water from a large Artesian well on Southampton common. Public institutions comprise the free grammar school, founded by Edward VI.: an hospital, dating from the time of Henry III.; numerous almshouses & other charities, a royal humane society, mechanics' literary and polytechnic institutions, an infirmary, botanic garden; and the surveying department of the ordnance board is now established at Southampton. The new docks, on the E. of the town, opened in 1842, have an area of 208 acres, and have admitted steamers of more than 700 tons burden. The W. India, Mediterranean, and other mails, have their station here, and the town communicates by steamers with all the ports of S. England, the Channel islands, Ireland, and by railway with London, and all the centre of England. The port extends from near Portsmouth to Christchurch. Customs revenue (1846) 59,741*l*. 12*s*. In 1845, 707 ships, aggregate burden 150,826 tons entered, and 708 do., burden 149,308 tons, cleared out of the port; and British and Irish produce to 1,475,105*l*. were exported in same year. Reg. shipping of port (1847) 4,965 tons. Here are some manufs. of silks & carpets, but ship-building and general commerce are the chief sources of wealth. Southampton is a place of fashionable resort in summer. The bor. is divided into 5 wards, and governed by a mayor, 10 aldermen, and 30 councillors. Corp. revenue (1847) 8,934*l*. Markets, Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. It has annual races and regatta. The bor. sends 2 mems. to H. of C. Reg. electors (1848) 2,258. Southampton appears to have risen on the decline of the ancient Claesentum, at Bittern, on the estuary of the Itchin; and in Saxon times it had a castle, of which, however, little, if any portion, now remains.—Southampton Water is a fine inlet, stretching from the Solent and Spithead, N.W. into the interior of Hampshire for about 11 m.; greatest breadth about 2 m. It bounds the New Forest hunds. on the E., receives the Anton, Itchin, and Hamble rivers. Its shores are picturesque, & it is usually covered with shipping. Calshot castle is on the W. side of its entrance, & the ruined Netley abbey, on its E. shore.

SOUTHAMPTON ISLAND, British N. America, on the N. side of Hudson bay, is between lat. 62° & 66° N., lon. 80° and 87° W. Coasts rugged and mountainous. Cape Southampton forms its S. extremity. It is conjectured to be a collection of islands, but its interior is unexplored.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA, a British colony, the territory of which comprises all that part of Australia extending from lat. 26° S. to the S. coast of the continent, between lon. 132° and 141° E., having S.E. the colony of Victoria, or Port-Phillip (Australia Felix), and E. the region watered by the Murray and its tributaries. Area roughly estim. at 300,000 sq. m. Pop. (1849) 34,000, of European descent, and rapidly increasing; aboriginal pop. 3,680. Coast line more indented than in any other part of Australia; Spencer's & St Vincent's gulfs, with Yorke peninsula, & Kangaroo island, being within the limits of this territory. Surface mostly undulating or level; the hill ranges stretch generally from N. to S. Mount Bryant, the most elevated summit E. of St Vincent's gulf, rises to 3,012 feet in height; the table land in Eyre peninsula, W. of Spencer's gulf, averages 1,300 feet in elevation. The Murray, which has the lower part of its course in this colony, is the only navigable river. Small streams are, however, numerous, and the country is, on the whole, pretty well watered. Principal lakes, Torrens, Alexandrina, and Alhert. Ponds and creeks are numerous, and a chain of lagoons borders the coast along Encounter bay in the S.E. Climate healthy, and much warmer than that of England; frosts are rare in the plains in winter; showers are frequent with S.W. winds in that season betw. May and October. Most part of the settled land is on the E. side of St Vincent gulf, where about one-third of the surface is estimated to be adapted for agriculture or grazing, one-third covered with scrub or forest, and the remaining one-third barren. The best tracts are in the level plain extending N. from Adelaide; along the banks of the Murray; and bordering the S.E. coast as far as the river Glenelg. The hills are interspersed with many fertile valleys, and some good land exists in Eyre peninsula. Tracts of 80 or 164 acres are sold by the government at 1*l.* per acre and upwards; and about 460,000 ac. had been disposed of early in 1848. In 1847, 36,440 acres were reported to be under cultivation, chiefly for wheat, oats, and barley; besides which grains, maize, potatoes, and some rye, are raised, the latter chiefly by German colonists, who inhabit many villages in and adjacent to the plain of Adelaide. The vine, olive, and mulberry, oranges, lemons, peaches, pomegranates, & many other fine fruits, come to perfection, as also tobacco, hops, & indigo. Sarsaparilla, sassafrass, and other drugs, are indigenous. Timber is plentiful. Sheep and cattle rearing are less extensively conducted than in New South Wales, and elsewhere in E. Australia; yet in 1847, the stock of sheep was estimated at a million, and that of horned cattle at 50,000. The increase is already so disproportionate to the number of shepherds, that the system of boiling down sheep for their tallow has commenced in this colony. Mining is highly important. Since 1843, some of the richest known veins of copper and lead have been discovered in S. Australia; the latter chiefly contiguous to Adelaide, the former in the hill chains, and in other localities. The Burra-burra copper mine yields an ore containing 75 per cent. of metal, and in 1847, 4,351 tons of ore from it were sold at Swansea, realizing 94,263*l.*; the total exports of copper being estim. at 10,000 tons, valued at 200,000*l.* The Kapunda (copper), and Glen Osmond (lead) mines, are also very productive. A small quantity of gold, also cobalt, manganese, zinc, quicksilver, & antimony, have been discovered, and emery was exported in 1847; but no mines of these metals had been opened then. Iron of excellent quality is plentiful, but the absence of coal obliges most part of the ores to be sent elsewhere for reduction. Some foundries, and manufs. of barilla, soap, tobacco, leather, and earthenware, are established in Adelaide, which is the cap. and centre of the foreign trade. Value of imports in 1847, chiefly from Gt. Britain, 410,825*l.*; of exports in do. 350,348*l.*, products of the colony standing for 275,215*l.* Much of the trade of W. Australia is conducted in shipping belonging to S. Australian colonists. The colony is subdivided into the cos. Hindmarsh, Adelaide, Gawler, Light, Stanley, Eyre, St. Russell, and Grey, on the E. side of St Vincent gulf, and Flinders, including Port Lincoln, on W. side of Spencer gulf. Government vests in a governor, an executive council of the five principal officers of the colony, and a legislative council consisting of the same, and four non-official members chosen by the governor. See Australia, erected into a colony in 1834, is the see of a bishop of the church of England. Public revenue (1847) 71,027*l.* Besides Adelaide its chief settlements are Port Adelaide, Albion, Gawler town, and Port Gawler.

The principal islands of Spain are the Baleares or Balearic islands in the Mediterranean; off the coasts are the isl. of Leon, some islets in the Bay of Vigo, and others at the mouth of the Ebro. The surface of the peninsula is more diversified than that of any other country of equal extent in Europe; its interior forms a vast elevated tableland, which in the plateau of Castile has a mean elev. of 2,300 ft. These are (from N. to S.)—I. the Pyrenees extending from Cape Creux, on the E., to the Bay of Biscay on the W., culminating point Pic Nethou, 11,168 feet; and their W. continuation the Asturian and Cantabrian mountains, some of which rise to 10,000 feet—II. the chain which separates the basins of the Douro and Tagus, the Sierras Guadarama, Gredos, and Gata. The pop. is only approximate, there having been no regular census for half a century, that given in the table is official. Madox, Dict. Geog., 1845, estimates it at 15,439,158.

Spain is rich in minerals, especially mercury, iron, copper, and lead. The celebr gold and silver mines of the time of the Ron have long been abandoned, but mercury is tracted in great abundance from the mine Almaden. Lead forms an important branch mining industry. Coal is found chiefly in Asturias, copper, tin, zinc, antimony, arsenic cobalt, are common, and rock salt is abundant the hills of Cardona. The princip. rivs. of S are, from N. to S., the Ter, Llobregat, Ebro, (dalaviar, Jucar, & Segura, flowing E. to the Mediterranean. The Minho, Douro, Tagus, Guadi and Guadalquivir, flowing mostly through Portugal W. and S. to the Atlantic. The N. s has only the Nalon, the Bidassau, & some mountain streams. The chief tributaries are the Esla the Pisuerga, which join the Douro; the Manzanares, which passes Madrid, and joins Jarama, an affl. of the Tagus. The Ara Gallego, and Segre, affls. of the Ebro, and Genil, affl. of the Guadalquivir. Few of these are navigable, and those only for small boats; their mouths. The only lakes, or lagoons in Spain are the Albufera in Valencia, and the Menor, in Murcia. The coasts of Spain, which have an extent of 1,800 m., are in general indented, except in the N.W. The chief capes Finistere on the N.W., & Trafalgar on the S. in the Atlantic; Gibraltar, Gata, Palos, & Cádiz in the Mediter.; Peñas & Ortegal, in the Bay of Biscay. The climate of Spain varies exceedingly with elevation and position; it is warm on the coasts; the table-lands are exposed to great heat in summer, and extreme cold in winter. Most of the mountains rise above the snow line, the highest of which, in the Pyrenees, is 8,952 feet; in Sierra Nevada, 11,190 feet. Mean annual temperature at Madrid 58° 2 Fahr. The annual fall of snow on the Sierra Nevada, and on the N. and E. coasts, is 25 to 35 inches, while on the table-lands of Castile it is only 10 inches, and the capital often exposed to severe drought. Winter is rainy season. The most noxious winds are the solano (the sirocco of Italy), a hot wind from the S., and the gallego, a cold wind from the N.W. Frost is often severe during the night in winter. Earthquakes are so frequent in the S. The soil is generally fertile except in the elevated and arid districts of central provs.; the chief crops are wheat, maize, barley, rice, hemp, and flax. The amount of corn is often insufficient for home consumption. The wines of Spain are much esteemed; the principal growths are those of Xeres (sherry), Rota, Malaga, Alicante, Malvasia, and Val de Peñas; the other products are soda (from marine plants), honey, wax, and silk, the latter very abundant in the S.E. provs. In the S. pr the sugar cane and cotton have been acclimated and there the orange and citron grow in great abundance. The best building timber grows on the N. coast; the cork tree, the kermes oak, the sumach tree, yield valuable products. The horses of Andalucia are celebrated; the mares and asses are remarkable for beauty and strength. Cattle are of good breeds. The race of sheep called the merino, yields a great quantity of excellent wool; their exportation has always been prohibited, their pasturage is regulated by ancient laws, and their number is reckoned at 6 millions. Goats are very abundant in the table-lands; the chamois is found in the Pyrenees; and the bear, wolf, wild cat, marten, lynx, in the different mountains. Fish is plentiful in the rivers, but abundant on the Atlantic coasts. The manufacturing industry,

Spain, formerly flourishing, has greatly declined; its gov. has still manufs. of saltpetre, gunpowder, cannon, and fire arms, tobacco, porcelain, glass, but they are mostly in decay; and the celebrated manuf. of swords at Toledo is nearly extinguished. The other manufs. are of silks, cottons, woollens, and leather. Cutlery, iron, and copper goods, are made chiefly in Biscay. The public roads in Spain, except those around the capital, are amongst the worst in Europe; wheel carriages are little used, and much of the transport is effected by means of mules. There are several canals, many of them on a magnificent scale, but mostly unfinished and unfit for navigation; the chief of these are the Imperial canal, commenced by Charles V., extending along the rt. b. of the Ebro; the canals of Castile, Lanzanares, Murcia, Alhacete, and Guadarama. The only railway is a line of 15½ m., from Madrid to Barcelona, opened in 1848. From the extent of its coast line, its numerous ports, its geographical position, and natural products, Spain possesses greater commercial advantages than any other country of Europe, but smuggling is so extensively carried on as to render it impossible to estimate the amount of its foreign commerce; the principal exports are wool, wine, randy, oil, fruits, iron, lead, mercury, and salt, with a small amount of silk and manufactured goods. Imports colonial goods, dried fish, and salted provisions, butter, cheese, rice, cotton and woollen goods, cutlery, glass, & building timber. The present inhabitants of Spain are descendants of the ancient Iberians, or of other races who colonised it at different periods. Four primitive families are discernible—I. the Spaniards, descendants of the original races, and of Greeks, Romans, Vandals, Goths, and Alans, comprising 3-20ths of the pop.—II. the Basques 1-24th.—III. the Moors, descendants of the conquerors who ruled for 7 centuries in the S. of the peninsula, 1-200th.—IV. the Gitanos, or gypsies, 2-50th. The Jewish race has disappeared from Spain since the expulsion of the Jews in 1492.

The government, since 1833, is a constitutional representative monarchy; the religion exclusively Roman Catholic. Education is very little diffused; the lower orders are nearly destitute of any means of instruction, except in the municipal cities, where infant schools have recently been established; before the suppression of the monastic orders, education was entirely in the hands of the Jesuits and other clergy. The children of the upper classes are educated in France and other countries. The universities, formerly 24 in number, are now reduced to 14, and these attended only by a few students of law and medicine. Army 142,200 men; marine (1846) ships of the line, 6 frigates, 5 corvettes, 6 brigs, steam packets, & sev. gun boats. Pub. rev. (1849) 008,985,640 reals. Debt (1841) 16,227,474,922 als. The peninsula, now forming the kingdoms of Spain and Portugal, was first visited by the Phenicians, & afterwards by the Carthaginians, who formed several establishments. It was conquered by the Romans after a resistance of 600 centuries; they divided it into three great provinces, viz. Tarracomensis in the E. centre and Bætica in the S., & Lusitania in the W. The Visigoths overran the country in the fifth century, and were driven from most of it by the Arabs in 711. The kingdom of Portugal was founded in 955. During 8 centuries the Christian princes were engaged in continual warfare with the Mohammedans. From this state the country was liberated, under Ferdinand and Isabella, by the conquest of Granada in 1492. This was followed by the pillage and expulsion of the Jews, who had possessed themselves of most of the commercial riches of the country. In the same year Columbus discovered the new world, and Spain became mistress of the greater part of America as then known. Of these vast colonial possessions, Spain has now only the isls. of Cuba, Puerto Rico, & some smaller isls. in Amer., the Philippine and Marianne islands in the Pacific, the Canary isls. in the Atlantic, Fernando Po, and the island of Annabon in the Gulf of Guinea, and Ceuta, Gomeria and Melilla, places used for the transportation of convicts, in Barbary. From the 16th century, Spain was divided into large provs. having mostly the title of kingdom, but by a royal decree of April 1833 it was partitioned into 48 smaller provs., each bearing the name of its cap., except Navarra & the three Basque provs. which remain unchanged, and possess peculiar privileges.

Buffaloes are the most important live stock; the breed of horses is small but hardy, hogs and goats are both domestic and wild; the elephant, rhinoceros, tiger, bear, deer, &c., roam in the forests, & the hippopotamus and crocodile are met with in the rivers. The inhabitants build their houses on posts, and adopt other usages of ultra-Gangetic nations; they manuf. gold and silver filagree work with great skill, also silk and cotton fabrics, earthenwares, arms, and domestic goods generally; from Palembang lacquered basins, cane boxes, and rattan mats of the best quality are exported to Singapore, and it is said that cannon were formerly cast at Acheen in the N.W., which territory is, however, peopled by a race of Moorish descent. The Scandinavian Alps traverse the country in the W., and separate it from Norway; many of their summits are constantly snow-clad. [NORWAY.] From this mountain region the country slopes E. to the Gulf of Bothnia, forming in its descent two elevated table lands, the 1st or W. most is 2,000 feet, and the E. most 360 to 800 feet above the sea. The tract of country bordering the Baltic is under 300 ft. in elev. The greater part of the surface is flat, the S. portion constitutes the plain of Scania. A line is supposed to traverse the country in lat. 56° 3' N., north of which to Cape North the land is gradually rising at the estimated rate of 4 feet in a century, while S. of it there is a slow & gradual subsidence. The country is watered by numerous streams, none of which are large; the principal are, from N. to S., the Tornea, Lulea, Pitea, Umea, Angermann, and the Dal-elf, which flow S.E. to the Gulf of Bothnia, and the Motåla, which traverses lake Wetter to the Baltic. Nearly one-eighth of the superficies is covered by lakes, some of which are very extensive. The largest are Wener, Wetter, and Maaler, all in the S. provs.; they afford great advantages for navigation; these lakes are connected by canals, the chief of which are those of Södertelge, Trollhätta, Hielmars, Strömsholm, and Gotha. There are extensive marshy tracts along the shores. The coast, which has a development of 1,400 miles, is deeply indented, forming vast bays and fiords, and studded with a multitude of low sandy islands, the chief of which are Gothland and Ösland in the Baltic. The climate of Sweden is mild for its northern position, the mean temperature of the year at Stockholm 52°.2 Fahr. The W. coasts are more mild and moist than the E. coasts. The summers are very hot, and the winters extremely cold. Spring is almost unknown. N. of lat. 61° mercury often freezes. In the N. the rivers are frozen, & snow covers the ground for 5 or 6 months in the year; in the central regions winter lasts for 3 or 4 months. The amount of rain is much less than in Norway. The prevailing winds are S. W. and W. The soil is not generally fertile, and the corn produced was formerly only about 2-3ds of that required; but from the great improvements in agriculture introduced by the government within the present century, and the general introduction of the potato, the produce is now adequate to the consumption. Barley is cultivated as far N. as lat. 69°, but the crops frequently fail. Rye, hemp, and potatoes are grown to lat. 66° N. Oats ripen to 63° 30', wheat and hops cease to be cultivated with advantage beyond lat. 62° N. Fruit trees, except the cherry, are limited to the S. of lat. 60°. One-fourth of the surface is covered with forests, but the produce of timber is small, much is used for fuel, and made into charcoal for use in the mines. There are few woods to the N. of lat. 64° N. The principal trees are the pine, fir, and birch, which extend to the extreme N. of the country, the lime, elm, ash, willow, and alder between lat. 61° and 63° N., the oak to lat. 61°, and the beech to lat. 57°. Tar and pitch are extracted from the roots of the pine. Rearing of live stock is an important branch of industry, but the pastures are poor, horses and cattle small, & the sheep yield an inferior wool. N. of lat. 64°, the rein deer is the only domestic animal. Among wild animals are the bear, which however is scarce, the wolf, lynx, fox, marten, lemming, hare, and squirrel. Fish are abundant on the coasts & in the lakes and rivers; the herring fishery has greatly declined, but lobsters are exported, and salmon is caught in all the principal rivers. The mining dists. of Sweden, mostly in the central provs., extend over 16,000 sq. m., the chief products are iron, which is distributed over nearly all the country, but the best is found in the læn Upsala; the annual produce of all the mines is about 70,000 tons of bar iron; in 1846, 31,411 tons were exported into Great Britain. The richest copper mines are at Fahlun; the annual produce in all is about 1,000 tons. Gold is not now sought for, and silver is procured only to a small extent. The other mineral products are cobalt, lime, coal of inferior quality, and porphyry. Mauufs. are chiefly confined to articles of domestic use; the principal are woollens, sugar, tobacco, paper, linens, cotton (in small quantity); tanning is an important branch of industry. Ship-building is carried on to some extent in the ports of the Baltic. Distilling and brewing are extensively prosecuted. The internal commerce of Sweden is considerable, and Swedish vessels visit most of the Atlantic ports of S. America; and the Mediterranean. Government is a constitutional monarchy. The established religion is Lutheran, but all sects are tolerated. Education is generally diffused, and well conducted in gymnasia, high and burgher schools. There are universities at Upsala and Lund. Army (1846) 39,486 men; of whom 26,700 are infantry, 8,000 cavalry, 5,140 artillery, besides a militia of 95,000 men. Navy, 21 ships of the line, 8 frigates, 8 brigs, and 250 small vessels. In 1397, by the treaty of Calmar, the crown of Sweden was united to those of Denmark and Norway by Margaret of Denmark. The Swedes recovered their independence under Gustavus Vasa in 1521. The House of Vasa ascended the throne in 1523, and gave to Sweden the celebrated Gustavus Adolphus. It was succeeded by the House of Deux-Ponts, which furnished the famous Charles XII., to this succeeded the Houses of Hessen-Cassel, and Holstein-Gottorp. In 1810, Marshal Bernadotte was chosen crown prince, & ascended the throne as Charles-John XIV. in 1818. Norway was annexed to Sweden in 1814, retaining its own laws. [NORWAY.]

Switzerland belongs to the region of the Central Alps, extending between Mont Blanc in Savoy &

the Gross Glockner in the Tyrol. The immense mass of Mount St Gothard forms the centre, or nucleus of a system of mountains, covered with perpetual snow and glaciers, the peaks of which are from 9,000 to 14,000 feet above the level of the sea. The Alps cover all the central, S., and S.E. portion of the country, and occupy more than one-half of its superficies. [ALPS] The Jura mountains extend along the N.W. borders, culminating points, the Dôle and Mont Tendre [JURA], and between these is an undulating plain, or table land, 135 m. in length, from the Lake of Geneva in the S.W., to the Lake of Constance in the N.E. Its extreme breadth is 50 m. Next the Alps it is 2,000 feet above the sea, sloping toward the Jura, where it is 1,350 feet. It has numerous valleys, some of which are of considerable extent. Among its mountains and hills are the Jorat in the Valais, the Albis between Zug and Zurich, the Allman in the E. of Zurich, and the Hauenstein between Basle and Soleure.

The high Alps form vast reservoirs, whence issue thousands of fertilizing torrents. The chief rivs. flow by the Rhine to the N. Sea, by the Rhone to the Mediterranean, by the Ticino to the Po and the Adriatic, and by the Inn to the Danube and Black Sea. The other principal rivers are the Thur & the Aar, affs. of the Rhine, the Emmen and the Limmat, affs. of the Aar. No country in Europe, except Scandinavia, has, in proportion to its size, so many lakes as Switzerland. Those of the Alpine regions occupy the lower parts of the valleys. They vary in depth from 500 to 1,900 feet, and are situated at an elevation of from 1,200 to 1,800 ft. above the sea; the chief of these are Lake Lemán, or the Lake of Geneva; Brienz, Thun, Waldstätten, or Lucerne; Zug, Wallenstatt, Zurich, Constance, or the Boden See; and on the S. of the Alps, Lugano and Maggiore. Most of these are traversed by steam-boats. The table land contains lakes Morat, Sempach, Baldeck, Halwyl, Greiffensee, & Peffikon. In the Jura are the lakes of Ncuchâtel and Bienne, the former traversed by steam boats. The climate of Switzerland, owing to its elevation, & other causes, is much more severe than might be expected from its position, nearly in mid-distance between the equator and the N. pole. It presents the greatest extremes, and the most violent contrasts. In Geneva, at an elevation of 1,230 feet, the mean pressure of the barometer is 27 inches; the thermometer ranges from 34° to 66° Fahr., and the average ann. amount of rain is 29 inches. On Mount St Bernard, barom. 21 in., therm. 18° to 43° Fahr., and amount of rain 65 in. The elevation of the lower limit of snow in the mountains is 3,900 ft. On the table land, and in the lower mountains snow falls in greater abundance than in other countries of the same lat. in Europe. On St Gothard snow falls at least once a month in summer. The large lakes are seldom frozen. In the upper valleys of the Jura, winter lasts six months; it is longer in those of the Alps. S.W. winds, which are frequent, usually bring rain; the N.E. wind, which blows on the table land in spring, is cold and dry. The warm S. wind greatly favours the climate of the canton Ticino; under the name of Föhn, the sirocco of the Alps, it blows with extreme violence, and causes great damage on the lakes. At an elevation of from 1,000 to 1,600 feet, the climate is pure and salubrious; but it is unhealthy in many of the deep and narrow valleys. Vegetation corresponds with the extremes of climate. In the Valais, the fig and grape ripen at the foot of ice-clad mountains, while near their summits the rhododendron and the lichen grow at the limit of the snow line. The corn raised in Switzerland is not nearly sufficient for the supply of its pop.; the most productive cantons are those of the N. & W. Here the vine ripens at an elevation of 1,900, & in some places at 2,100 ft. above the sea. It is cultivated on the slopes of the Jura, and in the valleys of the Rhine, Rhone, Reuss, Limmat, and Thur. Buckwheat ripens at an elevation of 2,200, and with a S. exposure at 3,000 feet; barley, rye, potatoes, and pot herbs at 4,000 feet. Flax & hemp are extensively grown; irrigation is judiciously managed; and in general, agriculture is making considerable progress. The slopes of the Jura, & of the Alps, and the high regions of the table-land, are covered with valuable timber trees, the oak, beech, larch, and birch. The pine grows to an elevation of 6,700 feet, shrubs to 7,400. The great wealth of Switzerland consists in its rich and excellent pastures, which in summer support vast numbers of cattle; the finest breeds are those of the Simmenthal, Gessenay, Gruyere, Zug, and Schwytz. There were in 1844, 853,000 horned cattle, about one-fourth of which were milch cows; 105,000 horses, 463,000 sheep, 347,000 goats, and 318,000 swine. The silk worm is reared in the valleys S. of the Alps, and of late also in the N. The forests abound in game, the lammergeyer inhabits the highest mountains, and the chamois is hunted in the Valais and in the Oberland. Fish of excellent quality is abundant in the lakes and the rivers. Iron is found in the mountains generally, but chiefly in the Jura; there are mines of lead, and zinc, in the Grisons. Turf is abundant in the marshy dists., and coal is found on the table-land. The princip. salt springs are at Bex, in the valley of the Rhone. Switzerland contains upwards of 300 mineral springs, 18 bath establishments of the first, and 186 of the second class. The cultivation of the vine is an important branch of industry in the S.W. cantons, and wine is exported. Kirschwesser, cyder, and perry, are made. Cheese is a valuable product; it is made chiefly in Gessenay, the Simmenthal, and the Emmenthal; that called Gruyere is much esteemed and extensively exported.

Switzerland has made rapid progress in manuf. industry. The E. and N.E. cantons manufacture cotton goods, the chief seats of which are Appenzell and St Gall. Silks are woven in Zurich and Basle, and linens at Bern. Neuchâtel has superior printing establishments. Watches, jewellery, and musical boxes, are the principal manufs. of the W. cantons; here 230,000 watches are made every year. The number of individuals employed in the different branches of industry in 1846, were—Silks, 40,000; cottons, 90,000; watches and jewellery, 30,000; woollens, paper, leather, ironwares, &c., 40,000; in all, 200,000. In winter the pop. of the Alps inhabit villages scattered over the lower valleys. In May, the cattle are led to the lower pastures; in July, they ascend to regions 6,000 feet above the sea; and about the 10th August, they pasture on the highest mountains, whence they descend to the valleys about the 10th October.

The principal races inhabiting Switzerland, are the Teutonic and the Celtic. The German language is spoken in a variety of patois, by 1,670,000 of the pop. in the N. and E. French is spoken in the Jura, and on the table-land W. of the lakes of Bienna, and Morat, and of the river Sarine, in part of the Valais, and the Alps in its vicinity, by about 474,000 Swiss. S. of the Alps, Italian is the language of 133,500 Swiss; the Romanche is spoken in the Engadine, and in the valleys of the Rhine by about 42,500 of the pop. The inhabitants of the Alps are mostly Roman Catholics. In the Jura, and on the table land, Protestants are most numerous. In 1838, there were 1,300,038 Protestants, and 888,860 Roman Catholics. Switzerland has three universities, at Basel, Bern, and Zurich. Public instruction is widely disseminated, & in the Protestant cantons Sunday and infant schools are on the increase. In 1844 there were in all 5,500 primary schools, attended by 35,000 pupils, or the 7th part of the pop. The Swiss Confed. is composed of 22 cantons, forming 25 independent states, united in a perpetual league. The central and W. part was called Helvetia, by the Romans, and the E. part, or the Grisons, Rhætia. The Confed. was founded 1st Jan. 1308, by the 3 cantons Uri, Schwytz, & Unterwalden. In 1353, it numbered 8 cantons; and in 1513, it was composed of 13 cantons. This old Confed., of 13 cantons, was increased by the adherence of several subject territories, and existed till 1798, when it was replaced by the Helvetic Republic, which lasted 4 years. In 1803, Napoleon organised a new Confed., composed of 19 cantons, by the addition of St Gall, the Grisons, Argovia, Thurgovia, Tessin, and Vaud. This Confed. was modified in 1815; the number of cantons was increased to 22 by the admission of Valais, Neuchâtel, & Geneva. The federal government was composed of a diet, and of a Vorort, or federal directory. The general diet met every second year, alternately in Zurich, Bern, and Lucerne. By the new constitution of 1848, the federal assembly is composed of two divisions, a national council and a senate, and Bern was chosen as the federal city. Every pa. supports its own poor. The Confed. has no standing army, but every Swiss is a soldier, and each canton contributes a fixed contingent when called on. In 1841 the armed force consisted of 64,000 men. Public rev. (1843-4) 20,311,060 fr. The Confed. has little or no debt.

55 sq. m. Estimated pop. 29,972. Surface mountainous, and near its N. extremity is a peak rising to 4,000 feet above the sea. Many parts of the island are fertile, producing corn, wine, silk, figs, and cotton. It forms, with the islands Zea, Mycoone, Thurmia, Serpho, Siphanto, Kimolos, Milo, and Sikinos, a gov. of Greece.—Syra, or Hermopolis, the cap., is a marit. town on the E. shore. Pop. 14,000. It is built around its harbour, at the foot of a conical-shaped hill, which formed the site of the older town. Since the Greek revolution many new streets & houses have been laid out; and Syra has attained a rank for commercial importance in Greece next to Athens. It is the residence of consuls of most European states, and is a principal station of the Mediterranean steamers going to and from Constantinople. In 1841, 1,050 vessels, mostly Greek, Turkish, British, Austrian, & Ionian, aggregate burden 104,880 tons, entered its port.

SYRACUSE (Ital. Siragosa, anc. Syracusa), a fortified city of Sicily, on its E. coast, cap. intend., dist. and cant., in modern times occupying only the site of the original and smallest quarter of the famous city of antiquity.—viz., the island of Ortygia, between the sea and the great harbour, 30 m. S.S.E. Catania. Lat. of light-house 37° 3' N., lon. 15° 17' 5" E. Pop., which in antiquity was said to have amounted to 200,000, is now only 14,000. The cathedral, formerly the temple of Minerva, is of Doric architecture, & has been a place of worship continuously for 2,500 years. The church of St Marcián claims to have been the earliest in Europe for Christian worship. The catacombs and the latomæ, or anc. prisons, in the quarries from which the materials of Syracuse were taken; the "ear of Dionysius;" the famous fountain of Arethusa, new used for a washing-trough; the remains of the strong fortress Hexapylon, of a temple of Diana, & Roman amphitheatre, some baths, walls, gates, and the palace of sixty beds, constructed by Agathocles, are the chief vestiges of antiquity. The middle age citadel of Maniaces, barracks, a college, royal academy, museum of antiquities, & public library, with numerous churches, may be chiefly noticed as belonging to the modern city. The noble harbour is admirably adapted for a commercial emporium; but its trade is now nearly confined to a few expts. of salt, wine, oil, & fish. Syracuse was founded B.C. 736 by a colony from Corinth, governed alternately as a republic or under kings: unsuccessfully besieged by the Athenians B.C. 414, and by the Carthaginians,—taken by the Romans B.C. 200; and, after a lengthened siege in 878, by the Saracens, who partially destroyed it, but it was chiefly ruined by the earthquake of 1693. It was the residence at different periods of Plato, Simonides, Zeno, and Cicero, the place where Hicetas first propounded the true revolution of the earth, and the birthplace of the poets Theocritus and Moschus, and the philosopher Archimedes, who lost his life at the capture of the city by the Romans.

SYRACUSE, a town of the United States, North America, New York, township Salina, cap. co Onondaga, at the junction of the Erie & Oswego canals, and on the W. railway of the state, 34 m. S.S.E. Oswego. Pop. (1850) 22,235. It has highly productive salt springs; and, in 1842, it had 36 salt factories, with vats of an aggregate extent of upwards of 1,500,000 square feet, and producing 654,992 bushels of salt.

SYRIA (with PALESTINE), a large division of Asiatic Turkey, mostly between lat. 31° & 37° N., and lon. 24° 30' and 40° E.; bounded N. by the

Amanian mountains, E. by the Euphrates, and the Arabian desert, S. by Arabia Petraea, & W. by the Mediterranean Sea. Estimated area 50,000 sq. m. Pop. about 1,865,000, mostly Mohammedans, but comprising about 345,000 Greek Christians, 260,000 Maronites and Roman Catholics, 175,000 Jews, 48,000 Druses, and 17,000 Metualis and Yezidis. The W., or coast portion, is mountainous; the E. chiefly an elevated plain. The mountain ranges proceed mostly N. to S.; the Alma-Dagh (anc. Mons Amanus), and Mount Lebanon (anc. Libanus), terminate on the coast in bold headlands, as do several spurs of Anti-Libanus, which range in Palestine, enclosing the fertile valley Coele-Syria. The mountains are rugged, consisting of limestone overlying grauwacke slate, and other silurian rocks, which appear in the summits of Libanus; but at their feet are many fertile tracts, the basins of small rivers; and here are several plains of high fertility, as those of Haouran in the E., Antioch and Aleppo in the N., Esdraelen and Sharen in the S. In the S. and E. granite, gneiss, and dolomite mntns. skirt the volcanic region of the Dead Sea, which is entered by the river Jordan; besides which, the chief rivers are the Aasy, or Orentes, and the Bekaa, both entering the Mediterranean. After the Dead Sea, the principal lakes are those of Tiberias, or Gennasereth, and Hulaah in the valley of the Jordan; some smaller ones exist near Damascus and Antioch. The surface being very uneven, the climate and products vary greatly within short distances. Along the coasts the heat is great, and the orange, banana, and date flourish, while the summits of the mountains are seen covered with snow. In the N., and on the elevated plain E. of the mountains, the climate is colder; but at Aleppo frosts are seldom severe, and snow rarely lies on the ground for more than a day at a time. The corn is nearly ripe early in May; and from June to September summer heats prevail, unbroken by any rain, though tempered in the W. by sea breezes. The samiel, a wind like the simoom of the desert, sometimes occurs at this season, and shocks of earthquakes are frequent. Heavy rains occur in spring and autumn, & the trees frequently retain their foliage till the beginning of December. Syria comprises a large extent of very productive soil. What is called the "desert" is not a sandy waste, but a region destitute of settled inhabs. and villages, yet with a surface of fine black mould, covered with rank grass and herbs, affording cover for numerous wild animals, and pasturage for many flocks and herds, fed there by wandering Bedouins. It is stated that the country is capable of producing sufficient to maintain ten times its present pop.; yet such is the rude method of agriculture, the depressed condition and insecurity of the rural pop., and the uncertainty of taxation and government regulations, that in bad years corn must frequently be imported from Egypt and elsewhere. Wheat, barley, maize, millet, lentils, and sesamum, are raised in the plains, principally in the Haouran, which has always been considered the granary of Syria. Cotton and the mulberry flourish on the coast, and silk is produced on the slopes of Lebanon. The cotton annually raised in the S. is estimated to amount in value to 350,000*l.*; and about 1,700 cantars of silk, 10,700 do. of tobacco, from 8,000 to 10,000 do. of gall nuts, and 300 do. of madder roots are annually produced. Other chief products are sheeps' wool, olive oil, sugar, indigo, scammony, and other gums, safflower, dates, timber, hides, and skins. Sheep and other live stock form, as in antiquity, a chief part of the wealth of the inhabs.; and all merchandise being conveyed on the backs of animals, it is estimated that the transit trade employs 80,000 beasts, and about 30,000 drivers. About 3,500 okes of sponge fished on the coast are sent to the ports of the Mediterranean annually; other fisheries are comparatively unimportant, as is mining industry. Damascus has about 4,000 looms engaged in the manuf. of silks, and the same manuf. is carried on to a considerable extent in Aleppo. Cotton, and some woollen fabrics, shawls, gold and silver thread stuffs, are also woven there and elsewhere, and the total produce of the looms of Aleppo is estimated at 250,000*l.* in annual value. Glass, earthenwares, leather, and soap, are made in the above and other towns, and in Palestine great numbers of religious ornaments are manufactured for sale. Commerce is greatly impeded by the want of roads, those that exist being mere mule or camel tracts; also by the deficiency of good harbours. But as Syria is on the high route from Bagdad, Mosul, and Erzeroum, to Mecca, caravans annually traverse it, bringing galls, indigo, Mocha coffee, skins, Cashmere shawls, and other Indian manufs., also the products of Asia Minor, Mesopotamia, and Persia, which are exchanged here for European manufs., and cochineal. In 1835, the total value of the exports by sea was estimated at 307,337*l.* The value of the imports in the same year was estimated at 506,210*l.* In 1847, the imports from Great Britain comprised 14,735,054 yds. of cotton fabrics, worth 317,915*l.*; cotton twist to the value of 72,881*l.*; the total value of British & Irish produce imported being 415,292*l.* Latakia, Tripoli, Beyrout, Kisarieh, and Jaffa, are the principal seaport towns. The trade of Syria is chiefly conducted by Christians, Jews, or Armenians. The Mohammedans are most numerous in the secondary towns, and in the rural districts. The Druses are an interesting and peculiar tribe amongst them, chiefly agricultural, but partly occupied in domestic weaving & other manufs., and inhabiting a part of Mount Lebanon, wherethey live under an emir, or prince of their own race. The Maronites are also a peculiar people, dwelling in their vicinity, and having a patriarch, twelve bishops, and numerous convents. The Metualis are Mohammedans of the Persian, or Shiah sect; and the Yezidis, and some other tribes, are adherents of idolatrous, or heretical creeds. Syria is divided into the pashalics of Aleppo, Damascus, Tripoli, and Acre; chief cities and towns are of same names, with Antioch, Hamah, Homs, Jerusalem, Nablous, Sichein, Saida, and Gaza. The government is conducted in the same corrupt and extortionate manner as in the other provs. of Turkey. Public rev., derived from taxation of every kind, is estimated at 44,000*l.* [PALESTINE.]

TIBET, or TIBET, an extensive region of Cent. Asia, included in the Chinese empire, stretching from lon. 78° to 104° E., and from the great chain of the Himalaya to an unascertained distance northward, having N. Chinese Turkestan, the desert of Gobi, and the Ko-ko-nor territory, W. Ladakh, Leh, and the other countries of "Little Tibet," lately belonging to the Sikhs, E. China-Proprietor, and S. the territories of Burmah, British India, Bootan, Sikkim, Nepal, and the Punjab. Pop. supposed to exceed one million. The W. part, which alone has been explored by Europeans, is a lofty table-land, with a very dry climate; the cold, although severe, is not so great as might have been predicated, and the lower limits of the snow line is higher on the N. than on the S. slope of the Himalaya, being estimated at 16,000 to 18,000 feet above the sea level. Nearly all the great rivers of S. Asia rise in this country: the Indus, Sutleje, Brahmaputra, Ganges, and Jumna, originate around the region of lat. 31° N., lon. 81° E. Numerous affls. of the Ganges break through the Himalaya also, from W. Tibet. From E. Tibet, which seems to be a maze of mountains, flow the Irrawadi, Menam, & Menam-kong, & here are also some head streams of the Yang-tze-kiang, or great river of China. In the W. half are several lakes of considerable size. The land in W. Tibet, so far as has been discovered, is very bare of trees, or large vegetable products; yet it abounds with game, & other wild animals, and numerous flocks of sheep and goats, the hairy wool of which is used for the manuf. of shawls and other fine fabrics in Cashmere. Barley, pease, and wheat, are the chief crops raised; garden vegetables and fruits are in little variety, and the inhabitants live more by pastoral than agricultural pursuits. The yak (bos grunniens), and several other kinds of cattle, are reared; horses, mules, and sheep are used as beasts of burden. A fine race of dogs, and the musk deer, a small species, are natives of Tibet. Clay-slate, granite, quartz, and limestone, are chief constituents of the mountain ranges; borax in great quantity, nitre, rock-salt, lead, silver, copper, gold, turquoise, and lapis-lazuli, are amongst the mineral products; but the great scarcity of fuel forms a serious obstacle to mining and the reduction of metals. Manufs. of woollens, sacking, and other woven fabrics, are pretty general, and much cloth is sent from Lassa into China. The traffic through Tibet is extensive, and mostly monopolised by the government and officers of state. The trade with China is conducted at Lassa and Sin-ning, a town of the Chinese prov. Kan-su, where the Tibetan caravans exchange the native produce and Indian goods for tea, silver bullion, brocades, fruits, tobacco, quicksilver, cinnabar, furs, porcelain, musical instruments, pearls, and coral. Nepal & Bootan derive all their Chinese goods through Tibet; and from the former and Bengal, English and Indian piece goods, sugar, tobacco, indigo, paper, rice, spices, sandal-wood, and gums, are received; from Assam, silk, iron, and stick lac; from Chinese Turkestan, horses and camels; from Ladakh, dried fruits, shawls, gamboge, saffron, copper, tobacco, and timber. The roads and bridges are far inferior to those of China. Tibet, which became subordinate to China in 1648, is politically divided into E., or Hither, and W., or Ulterior Tibet, each ruled by a minister from Pe-king, in conjunction with the ecclesiastical heads of the country, the Dalai-lama, at Lassa, the E. cap., and the Bantchin-erdeni, at Teshoo-Lombo, the W. capital. Tibet is the head quarters of Buddhism, which here exists in greatest purity. The country abounds with temples, and it is stated that 84,000 lamas, or priests, are supported at the expense of the government. Amongst the inhabitants there are believed to be about 8,000 Rom. Catholics. The Chinese armed force consists of 60,000 men, of whom 50,000 are infantry. The pop., like the other inhabs. of the table land of Central Asia, are of the Mongolian race. Besides Lassa and Teshoo-Lombo, the chief towns are Shigatze, Jiga-Gounggar, Natan, &c., of which we know little except the names.

Climate on the mnts. rude, but in the valleys as mild as that of N. Italy, and a surplus of corn over the home-consumption is raised. Chief crops, wheat, barley, oats, rye, buckwheat, maize, pulse, potatoes, fruits, tobacco, flax, hemp, saffron, and wine. The rearing of horses, sheep, and other live stock, is important. In the Szekler country is a breed of hardy ponies, similar to the Welsh, & the horses

Roads are almost impassable; except in a few towns, inns are unknown. The peasantry generally, especially those of the Greek church, are more depressed and ignorant than those of Hungary, except in the Saxon-land in the S. This part of Transylvania derives its name from having been settled by colonies from Lower Saxony, in the 12th century, and is divided into the dists. or stuhls, of Mediasch, Mühlenbach, Hermannstadt, Klausenburg, Scheuerstadt, Reusomark, and Broos or Szasnaras (the "seven towns"), to which Kronstadt and Bistritz were subsequently added. No country in the world has, within so small a compass, so great a variety in its pop. These comprise 14 distinct races, of which the 3 principal are Hungarians, Szeklers, and Saxons; the others are Walachians, German colonists, Bulgarians, Armenians, Greeks, Russians, Poles, Jews, Gypsies, and Moravians. The different forms of religion, which are supported by the state, and enjoy equal privileges, are Roman Catholic and United-Greek, 393,135; Protestant, 200,365; and Unitarian, 31,921; Jews and professors of the Disunited-Greek church, are tolerated. The coast line, which presents few inlets, is of the most luxuriant fertility for a few miles inland, beyond which the whole country is little better than a sandy waste, the rivers of Tripoli being mere torrents. Products of the coast are corn and fruits, in great variety; cotton, silk, tobacco, saffron, madder, and castor oil; in the interior, senna, dates, and galls are the chief sources of wealth, and the cassob and lotus are indigenous. The surplus produce of the date and olive plantations, with straw mats, earthen jars, and other domestic manufs., are partly exported by sea and partly disposed of to Bedouin traders. Wine of superior quality might be produced. Cattle, sheep, and poultry are sent to Malta. Rock-salt is an important article of export. Principal manufs. are carpets, thick cloaks, and other articles of clothing; camlets, goats' hair, sacking, prepared skins, morocco leather, earthenwares, and potash. Foreign commerce is mostly with Malta, Tunis, and the Levant; and the chief trade is in the harter of European goods for those of Central Africa, whence several caravans arrive annually with slaves, gold dust, ivory, senna, and natron. Lat. 34° 26' 4" N., lon. 35° 49' E. Pop. 15,000. It is neatly built, and surrounded by fine gardens, but the marshy character of its vicinity renders it unhealthy. Houses chiefly of stone, and the town has many remains of middle-age architecture; in and around it are numerous granitic columns and traces of antiquity, and an old castle stands on an adjacent height. Tripoli doubtless owed its name to its consisting of three distinct towns, while the Marina or El Mina, the principal seat of trade, is a separate quarter S.W.-ward, on a projecting point of land bordering the port. The harbour is small, shallow, and frequently unsafe, but Tripoli retains some export trade in silk, wool, cotton, tobacco, galls, cochineal, and soap. Most of the surface is an undulating region of hills and valleys, mountains and table-lands, of little elevation; but it is traversed in the centre from E. to W. by an extensive mountain chain. [BALKAN.] The other principal mountains are the DESPOTA DAGH or Rhodope in the S., PINDUS in the S.W., the Dinaric Alps in the W., and the Carpathians in the N. Turkey is watered by numerous rivers, the chief of which are the Danube, and its affs. the Drina, Morava, Aluta, Sereth, and Pruth, in the basin of the Black Sea; the Maritza, Strymon, Vardar, in the basin of the Archipelago in the S.; and the Voyussa, Drin, and Narenta, in the basin of the

Adriatic, in the W. Largest lakes are those of Ochrida and Soutari in the W. The climate is more severe than might be supposed from the geographical position of the country; in the recesses of the highest mountains snow lies during the greater part of the year. It is excessively cold in winter during N.E. winds, which are then prevalent, and in the plains of Walachia and Moldavia the sledge is used as in Russia. A great portion of Albania, protected by elevated mountains from the N.E. winds, enjoys a delicious climate; but this dist. is liable to be visited by destructive earthquakes. In the rocky dists. of the interior, and in the maritime valleys of Albania, the summer is insupportably hot. Destructive storms are frequent in the S. A great portion of Turkey is covered with forests; the best oak grows in Servia and Lower Bosnia; the largest forests of fir and pine occur in Bosnia and Upper Croatia. The olive thrives in the maritime plains of Albania, where also the orange and citron are cultivated. The vine grows in S. Turkey, Herzegovina, and Servia, at an elevation of from 1,400 to 2,000 feet. Maize is cultivated in the S.; rice, cotton, rye, and barley in Central Turkey, at an elevation of 2,000 to 3,000 feet. Agricultural operations are conducted in the rudest manner, and only a small portion of the country is cultivated. The principal wild animals are the brown bear in the wooded mountains between Albania and Macedonia, Bosnia, and the Lower Rodepe, but seldom in the Balkan; the wolf is common; the wild boar, chamois, stag, in the forests; the hare is abundant in Walachia; these are mostly hunted for their skins. Domestic animals comprise the dog, cat, hog; the sheep forms the principal riches of the Walachian provs., whence an immense quantity of wool is exported. Goats are more abundant in Turkey than in any other country of Europe. Cattle are extensively reared in Walachia, Servia, and Bosnia, and the buffalo is common in Walachia, Bulgaria, and Thrace. The horse of Turkey is small but active; the ass and mule are chiefly employed in Thrace. Trout, &c., are plentiful in the rivers; and leeches, which abound in the marshes, form an important article of export. Turkey has mines of iron, lead, salt, and marble, but none of them are worked to advantage. Manufs. are almost entirely domestic; the chief comprise saddles, copper & tin utensils, fire-arms, swords, coarse woollen cloths, linen & cotton spinning. Silks are manufd. chiefly at Salonika, Seres, and Larissa. Shawls are made only in the Asiatic provs., especially at Damascus. Carpets wrought by hand in the style of the Gobelins tapestry are extensively manufactured in Bulgaria, and in Servia. There are cotton printing works in different localities; and dyeing, especially of bright red colours, in Bulgaria and the S. provs. Tanneries are numerous; embroidery is carried on by the females in the S. provs. Distilleries of brandy from prunes are common throughout all the country. Printing exists only at Bucharest, Belgrade, Constantinople, Cetigne, and Montenegro; filigree work is made in the large towns, and there are powder-mills near Constantinople. Commerce is almost entirely in the hands of Greeks, Armenians, and Jews. [ADRIANOPLE, BOSNIA, BULGARIA, CONSTANTINOPLE.]

TURKEY IN ASIA extends between lat. 30° and 42° N., and lon. 26° to 48° E.; bounded E. by Persia, S. by the Persian Gulf and Arabia, W. by the Mediterranean, N. by the Sea of Marmora and the Black Sea, and N.E. by Russia; and comprises, in the Archipelago, the islands Mitylene, Scio, Samos, Nicaria, Patmos, Cos, Rhodes, and Scarpanto, with Cyprus in the Mediterranean. The principal lakes are Van and the Dead Sea; and the chief rivers the Euphrates, Tigris, & their affls., which flow S. to the Persian Gulf; the Kizil-Irmak, Yeshil-Irmak, which flow N. to the Black Sea; the Sarabat, and Meander to the Archipelago; the Sihun, Jihoon, Aasy to the Mediterranean; and the Jordan to the Dead Sea. The chief mountains are the ranges of Taurus, Anti-Taurus, & Lebanon. The soil and climate present many varieties; in the S. are vast arid plains, but on the river banks and in the valleys of Lebanon, the soil is extremely fertile. The summits of Taurus are clad with snow, and their flanks are covered with the vegetation of cold and temperate countries, while the valleys have a temperature almost tropical, and produce the fruits of S. Asia. The climate of Anatolia is temperate, and the soil is capable of producing all kinds of grain and fruit. The mountains contain all the useful metals. The chief products are oil, dye stuffs, medicinal plants, gums, wax, dried fruits, gall nuts, cotton, silk, wool, goats' hair, leeches, and sponges. The general features of the country are described under ASIA MINOR, and particulars under the heads ADANA, ANATOLIA, ARMENIA, BAGDAD, CARAMANIA, DAMASCUS, ERZEROU, KURDISTAN, MESOPOTAMIA, PALESTINE, SYRIA, TRENIZONDE. The Turks, originally from Turkestan, founded, at different times, several empires in Asia. At the end of the 13th century, Osman, or Othman, one of their emirs or princes, established the present empire in Asia-Minor. The Turks invaded Europe at the end of the 14th century, and conquered successively their present provs.; they took Constantinople in 1453. In the 16th century their dominion extended in Europe over the whole of Greece, part of Hungary, the Crimea, and the shores of the Black Sea; and the whole of the countries now forming Turkey in Asia, the Hedjaz, Egypt, and the regencies of Tripoli, Tunis, and Algiers, were subjugated by them. But since the 17th century, their power has greatly declined. Austria has expelled them from Hungary; Russia has deprived them of the provs. between the mouths of the Danube and the Caucasus in Europe, & those forming W. Transcaucasia in Asia; the Greeks have formed an independent state; Algiers has been wrested by the French; Moldavia, Walachia, and Servia, are under the influence of Russia, and only nominally subject to the Porte, whose power has nearly vanished from many of the provs. of Asia-Minor, Arabia, and Egypt. The Turks, who call themselves Osmanlis, from Osman, number about 1-3d of the pop. in European & Asiatic Turkey; the remainder is composed of Tartars, Moldavians, Walachians, Servians, Bulgarians, Morlaks, Montenegrins, Albanians, Jews, Bohemians or Gipsies, Armenians, Georgians, Franks, or Christians, Turcomans, Kurds, Arabians, and independent nomad tribes in Asia. Mohammedanism is dominant in the empire, but a great portion of the pop. are Christians, who, indeed, far outnumber the Mohammedans in European Turkey. The emperor, who is styled sultan or grand signor, is regarded as absolute sovereign of the state, and Supreme Pontiff. The provs. are placed under pashas, whose authority is exercised with great caprice, and is frequently most oppressive. Several towns and small communities form a species of republics in the middle of this despotic state.

† Incorporated with Tuscany 23th May 1848.

The chain of the Apennines covers the N. and N.E. portion of the grand duchy; the highest point, Monte Falterona, in which the Arno has its origin, is 5,557 feet above the sea; the rest of the territory is agreeably diversified by hills and valleys. The principal rivers are the Arno, Ombrone, and Serchio, the former receiving nearly all the streams from the S. slope of the Apennines, & both flowing to the Mediterranean. The Tiber rises in the E. of Tuscany. The canal of Chiana unites the river Chiana with the Arno. Tuscany has no lakes of any extent, but numerous pools and extensive marshes. The climate is mild and salubrious; except in the Maremma, a marshy dist., extending along the S. coast, & covering nearly 1-6th part of the superficies of the state, the malaria from which produces dangerous fevers. Tuscany is celebrated for its mineral riches, and for the number of its mineral and thermal springs. Iron is most abundant in the isl. of Elba, copper, argentiferous lead, sulphur, mercury, alum, coal, statuary marble, and alabaster, in different parts of the grand duchy; and borax is supplied in great abundance from the singular borax lagoons of Volterra. From its fertility the Val d'Arno is called the garden of Italy, but agriculture is so imperfectly conducted that the corn raised is insufficient for home consumption. The chief crops are maize, wheat, rye, and barley. The culture of oil is prosecuted with great care, and that called Florence oil is celebrated. Wine is generally of inferior quality; that of Montepulciano is the best. Mules and sheep are of superior breeds, & herds of cattle are pastured in the drained portions of the Maremma. The principal manufs. are silks, in which Tuscany maintains its celebrity; woollens, which at one time employed 30,000 persons in Florence alone, but which are now confined to coarse cloths; paper of excellent quality is extensively manufd. The making of straw-hats has greatly declined, although still important, especially in the vicinity of the capital, where great numbers of the peasantry are employed in preparing the straw. The other branches of industry comprise the manuf. of glass and crystal, articles in marble, alabaster, iron, brass, porcelain, coral, wax, carpet making, and typography. The export of manufactured goods forms a chief branch of the trade of Leghorn, whence 40 or 50 barges, with 10 or 12 men each, are annually sent to the coral fishery. The mercantile marine comprised, in 1844, 774 ships of all sizes, with a total of 25,712 tons, of which 5,809 belonged to Elba. Chief exports, olive oil, hides, straw-hats, horax, rags, wool, hemp, potash, coral, marble, tallow, cork, building timber, and paper. Imports British manufactures, grain, colonial goods, French, Swiss, and German manufactures, and salt fish. Government was formerly an absolute monarchy, but a representative constitution was obtained in 1848. Tuscany has long been considered the most enlightened and flourishing state in Italy. Public instruction is widely diffused, and its dialect is considered the purest Italian. Pisa, Siena, and Florence are the seats of universities. The army comprises 5,500 men; navy 3 schooners and 2 gun-boats. [ELBA—ETRURIA.]

The N. of the gov. is hilly; elsewhere the surface is chiefly level, abounding in small lakes. Climate severe; soil generally poor; but sufficient corn is raised for consumption. Large quantities of hemp, flax, and beans are raised. Forests are extensive, particularly in the N. Cattle for consumption are mostly imported. Manufs. comprise bricks, glasswares, woollen cloths, leather, dyeing materials, and spirits. Commerce active. The gov. is subdivided into 12 circs., or districts. Principal towns, Tver, the cap., Rshév, Tershok, Ostashkov, and Vishni-Volotchok.—Tver, the cap., is situated on the Volga, here crossed by a wooden bridge, 550 ft. in length, and joined by the Tvertza, 90 m. It comprises the town-proper, several suburbs, and a citadel; an imperial palace, a cathedral, numerous other churches, and a seminary. Here are also numerous gov. offices, barracks, fairs, a theatre, a college, and various schools. The trade is considerable, and facilitated by canals, which establish a water communication between the Baltic & Caspian Seas. Tver being on the high road between Moscow and St Petersburg, is an entrepôt for corn from the S. destined for the capital, and for goods conveyed overland to and from Riga. Sea at Berwick, after a course of 95 m., in which it traverses a basin estimated at 1,870 sq. m., or larger than that of any other Scottish river, except the Tay. Principal affls., the Yarrow, Etrick, Teviot, and Till from the S., Biggar, Gala, Leader, and Adder from the N. Before reaching Peebles, it has completed 1,000 feet of descent, and in the remaining part of its course it has generally a very gentle current. It is tidal to Norham castle, 10 m. from the sea, but navigable only in its last 6 m. for boats of 30 tons burden, and the traffic on its waters is mostly confined to Berwick. The Tweed & Clyde take their origin in the same mountain range, and flow for a considerable way very near each other. The Biggar, an affl. of the Tweed, is separated from the Clyde only by a level boggy tract 6 m. across; they could be easily connected by a canal. Total free population (1850), 20,677,361. Slaves, 8,179,589.

 In 1790, the population of the United States was 3,929,574, 1820, 9,838,121; 1840, 17,063,833.
 The thirteen original States of the Union distinguished thus † Names of slaveholding States preceded by a star, thus *

The United States territories, in their northern boundary, commence on the S. side of that elevated water-shed which extends in a waving line from lat. 50° to 55° N. on the western side of the continent, to lat. 45° on the eastern side, and which divides the rivers that flow N. to the Arctic Ocean from those that flow S. into the Atlantic and Pacific. The chain of the Rocky mntns., having an elevation of from 12,000 to 15,000 feet, runs along the whole western parts, and the Alleghany and Appalachian mntns., rising in some places to 6,000 ft. elevation, extend along a considerable portion of the eastern, or Atlantic side. Between these two chains lie the basins of the Mississippi, and its great tributaries the Missouri, Ohio, and Arkansas; so that the main portion of the United States may be characterized as one vast undulating valley. The region around and to the N. of the great chain of lakes, is of granitic formation, as also the whole eastern portion of the Alleghany range. The Rocky mountains are likewise chiefly granitic with volcanic mntns. interspersed. Silurian strata occupy a considerable portion of the northern and central part of the valley, while above these lie limestone and old red sandstone and coal. An extensive coal bed forms the centre of the state Michigan. Coal also lies on the W. and E. flanks of the Alleghanies, and a continuous field of this mineral extends through Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Kentucky, to Alabama, lat. 33° S. Another extensive coal-field extends from Illinois to Kentucky. The more southern states are formed chiefly of arenaceous limestone, or secondary and tertiary strata. The soil of the great river basins is a deep vegetable loam, superimposed on alluvial clay. There are no very large lakes S. of the great chain of lakes, but the country is everywhere intersected by extensive navigable rivers, and their numerous affluents. The Chesapeake, Delaware, Massachusetts, and Penobscot, are the principal bays. Principal harbours are—Portsmouth, Portland, Boston, New York, Baltimore, Charleston, and New Orleans. The climate of the N.E. states is variable, with extremes of summer-heat and winter-cold. [NEW YORK, &c.] The southern states partake more of a tropical climate. [NEW ORLEANS.] The coasts of the Pacific are milder, and in the N. more moist, than those of the Atlantic. Mean ann. rain, New York, 36 inches. N. of lat. 44°, the birch, pines, American elm, willow, maple, and the plants of N. Europe are chief forest products; betw. lat. 44° and 35°, especially in the uplands, the oak, beech, sycamore, acacia, poplar, walnut, sassafras, and cedar, are predominant trees; and in the lowlands of this region the cypress and other products of S. Europe. S. of lat. 35°, the magnolia, the tulip tree, sugar-cane, and cotton, flourish, and the vegetation has mostly a tropical character. In the N. states farms and properties are mostly small, and cultivated by the proprietors; in the S. & W. are many large properties; and in the rice estates of Louisiana, a single field sometimes comprises 300 or 400 acres. Price of land extremely variable; near Philadelphia, the best cleared land fetches from 100 to 120 dollars per acre; in parts of New York, 25 dollars is an average price; the prairie lands in the W. states (Michigan, Illinois, &c.) are offered by the gov. at an upset price of 1½ doll. an ac. Wheat and maize are raised in every part of the Union, the largest quantity of the first being produced in the states Ohio, New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia. Oats, rye, buckwheat, and rice, are the other principal grains; rice is produced in by far the greatest quantity in S. Carolina. The sugar cane is raised as far N. as lat. 33° N., though it does not succeed well N. of lat. 31° 30'. A sugar procured from the juice of the maple tree, supplies its place in the most N. states. Cotton is confined to the S. states; the average annual amount is estimated at 750 millions lbs. The tobacco annually raised in the Union is about two millions cwts., the principal portion of which is raised in Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Maryland, & N. Carolina. Hay, hops, potatoes, wax, silk, hemp, flax, olives, madder, and indigo, are the chief remaining crops. The domestic animals of America have all been introduced from Europe. It has been estimated that there are in the Union 25 millions of sheep, 1-5th being in the state of New York, which has also the largest proportion of cattle, and most other live stock; hogs are, however, most plentiful in the middle states, and Cincinnati (Ohio), is the greatest mart for pork. Vast herds of bisons wander over the wide prairies of the W.; the American elk, antelope, cougar, Virginian deer, bears, foxes, raccoons, opossums, and many large birds of prey, & serpents, are amongst the wild animals. Gold mines exist in Virginia, Carolina, and Georgia. Mercury is found in Kentucky, Ohio, and on the borders of the great lakes, & copper especially in the vicinity of Lake Superior. Coal is now extensively raised in many parts W. the Alleghany mntns., particularly in Pennsylvania, which has accordingly become the great seat of railw. enterprise. Illinois and Wisconsin, possess the richest lead mines in the world. The salt springs in New York yield salt to upwards of 5,600,000 dollars in value; the lead raised amounts to nearly 13,950 tons annually, of which about half is produced in the Wisconsin territory, and the rest chiefly in Illinois and Missouri; gold, amounting to the value of 529,605 dollars was mined in 1840, more than half being from North Carolina; and in all, 49,923 hands were stated to be engaged in mining industry. The cod and whale fisheries are extensively pursued; and in 1849, 800 vessels were employed in the S. sea fisheries. The states are to a great extent supplied with British and other European manufactures; but of late years, extensive home manufs. have been in operation, especially cotton, woollen, leather, metallic wares, and other goods, chiefly in the eastern states. In 1848, produce of all kinds to the value of 132 million dollars were exported. Total imports for same year, 154 million dolls. Of late years, a considerable quantity of grain and agricultural produce has been exported to Europe. The internal communication is facilitated by numerous canals and railways. In 1850, there were 4,000 miles of canals in operation, and 9,714 miles of railway. Telegraphic communication and postage at a cheap rate, extend throughout all the more densely peopled states.

The government of the United States is that of a confederated republic. Each state has its separate and independent legislative, judiciary, and executive government, consisting of an assembly, senate, governor, judges, &c., who have unlimited powers in all local matters, and in everything except what is conceded to, & concerns, the general republic. The Federal government consists of a president, chosen for 4 years, by special electors from each state, who is commander-in-chief of the army and navy, and who, with advice and consent of the senate, levies war or makes peace, appoints judges, and other government officers. The senate consists of 2 members chosen from each state, for a term of 6 years, the number in 1850, was 60 members; over this body, the vice-president presides. The house of representatives consists of one member for every 70,680 inhabs., omitting 3-5ths of the slaves. The representatives are elected for 2 years, and in 1850 amounted to 231. Their powers and duties correspond to those of the members of the English House of Commons. They receive an allowance of 8 dolls. per day during the sitting of Congress. The cabinet consists of a secretary of state, and of the treasury, of war, & of the navy, an attorney-general and postmaster-general, none of whom are mems. of the legislature. Congress holds its sittings in Washington, the cap. of the republic. The judicial power is vested in a chief justice, and 8 associate judges, and of 9 supreme dist. judges, and 34 common district judges, with right of appeal, in certain cases, to the circuit courts, and also to the supreme court. The system of law throughout the states is the common law of England, modified by local acts of the states and of the federal government. Educational estahs. are very numerous, both of the higher and more elementary kinds, and the national allowance for education for 1849, amounted to 20 million dolls. The revenue of the states is derived chiefly from customs and imposts, sale of public lands, and rarely from direct taxation. Total revenue for 1848, amounted to 58,394,201 dollars; federal debt, 65 million dollars; aggregate debts of the different states, 205 million dollars.

The regular standing army amounted in 1849 to 10,320; but the aggregate amount of militia force in all the states is nearly 2 millions of men. The navy in same year consisted of 11 ships of the line, 12 first-class frigates, 22 sloops, 14 steamers, and 9 smaller craft.

There is no state establishment for religion, and all religions sects are on a civil equality. Amongst the variety of denominations, the sects appear to rank, as to numbers, in the order of Baptists, Presbyterians, Methodists, Episcopalians, Roman Catholics, Quakers, Universalists, and Unitarians. The pop. are, in their origin, a mixture of British, Dutch, German, French, and African Negroes, the aboriginal Red Indian being now almost totally extirpated, except in the west, among the Rocky mtns., and a few of the Cherokee nation, who have formed a community and advanced considerably in civilization. The New England states, Virginia and the Carolinas, are almost purely of British descent. Many Dutch and Irish are incorporated with the pop. of New York and Pennsylvania, and the middle states. French & Irish are numerous in Louisiana and Indiana. The annual emigration to the states is upwards of 200,000.

The first British colony settled in Virginia in 1607. The first symptoms of the American revolution commenced in 1773; the first battle was fought at Lexington in April 1775. The war terminated by the surrender of Lord Cornwallis, Oct. 1783; and in same year, the first Congress assembled in Philadelphia. In September 1787, the constitution was adopted, and Washington was elected president.

URAL MOUNTAINS, a great mountain system of the Russian empire, forming a vast undulating region, consisting of various round-backed, plateau-shaped, masses of land, mostly of small elevation. Its central ridge separates Europe & Asia, about lon. 60° E., dividing the gov. Vologda and Archangel from Tobolsk, covering with its ramifications portions of the gov. Perm and Orenburg, and separating the basins of the Volga and Ob in the middle and S. The Urals extend, in a limited sense, from the Arctic Ocean in the N. to Orenburg in the S., through 18° of lat., but considered as traversing the isls. of Novia Zemlia, and terminating in the high grounds between the Aral and Caspian seas, they cover an extent of 30° of lat. The Obdorsk mountains leave the middle chain in lat. 62°, trend N.N.W. 500 m. to the prom. of Kamin Nos. Elevation 200 to 600 feet. The chief part of this chain is called the Timan Mountains (first known in Europe only in 1843). Average height 1,000 ft. VENICE (Italian Venezia, German Venedig, ancient Venetia), a fortified city of Austrian Italy, cap. gov. and deleg., & one of the two caps. of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, in the lagoons of Venice, a sort of vast lake, separated from the Adriatic by a long belt of low land, & 2 m. from the continent, with which it is connected by a stupendous bridge of 222 arches, forming part of the railway to Padua; lat. of St Mark 45° 25' 9" N., lon. 12° 20' 2" E. Pop. (1842) 110,000, besides the garrison. Mean temperature of year 55° .3; winter 38°; summer 73° Fahr. It is the see of a Roman Catholic primate, Greek and Armenian bishops, and the residence of the viceroy during part of the winter; the centre of the maritime establishments of Austria, and the residence of the commander-general of the imperial marine. Venice, for many centuries, the cap. of a celebrated republic, the first maritime and commercial power of the world, and one of the finest cities in Europe, is unique, both as regards position and construction, being built entirely on piles and occupying 70 or 80 small islands, separated by 149 canals, which are crossed by 306 bridges. The chief of the former is the Canal Grande, 100 to 180 feet wide, and bordered by magnificent palaces and churches; it separates the city into two nearly equal portions, which are connected by the bridge of the Rialto, built of white marble, and consisting of a single arch. The streets or lanes are so narrow and intricate as to render the city a vast labyrinth, and being fit only for foot passengers, the place of wheel carriages is supplied by small barges, called Gondolas, the peculiar form and great number of which constantly traversing the principal canals, forms one of the chief characteristics of the city. The largest street, the Merceria, in which are the best shops, is only 15 feet wide; the principal promenades are the square of St Mark; and the public gardens, which are nearly surrounded by the sea. Among its many squares, the most remarkable for extent, regularity, and beauty of situation, is the Piazza di San Marco, on the S. side of the city, at the entrance of the grand canal. On the E. side of this is a smaller square called the Piazzetta, and at the angle, between these, is the church of St Mark. Venice contains a vast number of magnificent churches and palaces, adorned with the paintings of Titian and the frescoes of Tintoretto and Paul Veronese. The chief edifices are the palace of the Procuratie Vecchie and the Procuratie Nuove, which occupy the greater part of the square of St Mark, around which extends a vast gallery, containing elegant shops and cafés. The portinn of the Procuratie Nuove next the Piazzetta is the chef-d'œuvre of Sansovino, & one of the finest buildings in existence. The old library of St Mark occupies a magnificent hall, and in the same building is the Zecca, or mint, where, in 1284, the celebrated ducat of Venice, the most ancient coin in Europe, was struck. The former palace of the doge, built by Marino Faliero in the 14th century, is remarkable for its architecture, and its imposing mass; its interior is decorated with many of the finest works of the great masters. The bridge of sighs connects this palace with the former prisons and dungeons of the inquisition. Among the ecclesiastical edifices, the most magnificent is the church of St Mark, with its golden ceilings, its pavement of jasper and porphyry, its 500 columns of black, white, & veined marble, bronze, alabaster, verde antique and serpentine. It contains the celebrated Palla d'Oro, a species of mosaic, in gold, silver, and enamel, made at Constantinople in the 10th century, and a vast reliquary, with many antiquities and objects of art. Over the portal of this magnificent temple, the 4 celebrated bronze horses which were founded at Corinth, and successively adorned Athens, Rome, Constantinople, Venice, and Paris, were replaced in 1815. In front of St Mark, are three bronze pedestals, with masts, now bearing the Austrian standards, & near it are the Campanile tower, the Torre dell Orologio, or clock tower, and 2 granite columns, one surmounted by the lion of St Mark, and the other by the statue of St Theodore. The other churches are S. Giorgio Maggiore, the Zitelle, and the church of the Saluta, with a fine cupola, the churches of the Jesuits, the Scalzi, and those of Miracoli & of St Peter, formerly the patriarchal see, & the church of the Frari, with a fine monument to Canova; most of these, with the dogana or custom house, are situated on the grand canal. Venice has 6 theatres, the 7th and finest having been destroyed by fire in 1836. The arsenal, situated in an island, surrounded by high walls, was long the first in Europe, and still preserves some importance. The chief scientific and literary institutions are the lyceum, with a rich cabinet of natural history and a botanic garden, 2 royal gymnasia, and the seminary of the Saluta, occupying the former convent of this name, with valuable scientific collections, & a rich library: normal high school, marine college, academy and school of the fine arts, the oldest of its kind in existence. The library of St Mark, comprising 90,000 vols., with a fine cabinet of antiquities and medals, is one of the richest in Italy, and among the largest in Europe. One of the most remarkable institutions in Venice, is that of the Archivio Generale, which contains an immense mass of documents relative to the history of Venice. In the middle ages, Venice had a monopoly of the manuf. of glass, but this has greatly declined, and its manufs. are now confined to mirrors, jewellery, artificial pearls, silks, & porcelain; its printing and book trade is still extensive. Imports comprise sugar, coffee, & other colonial produce, cotton and woollen fabrics, cotton yarn & raw cotton, hardware goods, dye stuffs, salted fish and grain. Exports, silk and silk goods, glass wares and books. The origin of Venice dates from the period of the invasion of Attila in 452, when a number of the inhabitants of Venetia, and other parts of Italy, taking refuge in the islands of the Adriatic, formed a confederation to oppose the barbarians. In 697 they elected, as the head of their government, a doge or duke (dux). The Venetian states formed themselves into a republic in 809. In 997 they took possession of the town of Narenta, a nest of pirates, and thus commenced their maritime power; they afterwards subjugated all the towns of Dalmatia. The crusades were a source of aggrandisement for Venice. At the end of the 12th century, the Venetians made themselves masters of part of the Morea, Corfu, Cephalonia, and Crete. During two centuries they monopolized the commerce of India by the route of Egypt; but they lost this on the discovery of the passage by the Cape of Good Hope. The state attained the height of its prosperity in the 15th century. It began to decline at the beginning of the 16th century, and its overthrow was completed by the French in 1797. By the treaty of Presburg, in 1805, it was made over, with the provs. of the continent, to the kingdom of Italy, and was held by the French till 1814, when it reverted to Austria. In 1848, the Venetians revolted against the Austrians, & held the city for several months. The gov. of Venice comprises 8 delegs., which bear the names of their caps. Venice, Padua, Vicenza, Verona, Rovigo, Treviso, Belluno, and Udine.—The Gulf of Venice is formed by the Adriatic, on the N.E. coast of Italy, bounded by the Piave and Brenta.

VICTORIA (formerly called AUSTRALIA-FELIX and PORT PHILLIP), a British colonial territory, comprising all the part of Australia S. the rivers Murrumbidgee and Murray, between lat. 34° and 39° S., and lon. 141° and 150° E., having N.E. New South Wales, W. the colony of S. Australia, and S. the Ocean and Bass's Strait, separating it from Tasmania. Estimated area 80,000 sq. m. Pop. (1846) 32,395; (1850) 60,000 (?). The territory derived its former name from the fine bay of Port Phillip, near the centre of its coast line; besides which, here are the inlets Western Port, Corner inlet, Lake King, Port Fairy, and Portland Bay, most of which afford good anchorage, and are the seats of incipient towns. Surface mostly undulating or level, separated into different river basins by hill chains. In the E. the Warragong mountains or Australian Alps, shut off the fertile and densely-wooded marit. region Gipps-land from the rest of the country, and Mount Kocinczko there rises to 6,500 feet in elevation. In the W. are the Australian Pyrenees & Grampians, with many isolated heights. Principal rivers are the Murray, Hume, Hovell, N. the mountains; the streams flowing direct to the sea are all small, and nearly unnavigable, but the country there is well watered, and it has many considerable salt lakes—Lake Corangamite, in the W., being 90 m. in circuit. Climate more similar to that of Great Britain than in any other part of Australia, being moist, less hot than New South Wales in the summer, and not so cold as Van Diemen's Land in winter. Temp. at Port Philip ranges from 32° to 90° in the year, and may average about 61° Fahr. Soil more fertile generally than in New S. Wales, though around the borders are extensive tracts of barren land. For about 50 m. from the coast the country is almost everywhere of high fertility; there is also much good land on the banks of the Hume and Hovell; and although hitherto the corn raised has been inadequate for home consumption, and a supply has been imported from Tasmania, this colony bids fair to become a thriving agricultural region. Sheep and cattle rearing are, however, as in New South Wales, the principal occupations of the pop., and in 1847, the number of sheep was estimated at 4,397,600, of horned cattle 344,300, and horses 14,160. In the same year, 100 acres were planted with vines, and 1,300 gallons of wine were made, chiefly near Geelong. Wheat, oats, barley, potatoes, salt from the lakes, pumice-stone, lava, and other volcanic products, abundant in the W. plains, are other chief articles of produce. Some veins of coal, and ores of copper, lead, and manganese, have been met with, and gold has been recently found and exported in great abundance. The other exports are chiefly pastoral produce—wool, sheep, cattle, hides, skins, tallow, beef, pork, timber, mimosa, bark, and a few other articles. In 1846, the export of wool amounted to 6,406,950 lbs.; until recently, however, the general exports & imports have not been separated from those of New South Wales, of which Victoria has hitherto formed a dependency. Principal towns—Melbourne, Geelong, and Portland. The colony recently comprised only the 3 cos. Bourke, Grant, and Normanby; but the rest of the country S. the mntns., has been subdivided into 20 other cos., proclaimed in 1848. At present (1850) it sends 6 mems. to the legislative council of New South Wales. Public rev. (1847) 68,143*l.*, or including government sales of land in same year, 138,294*l.* It was first settled by the British about 1834.

Of the above cos., Anglesey, Carnarvon, Denbigh, Flint, Merioneth, and Montgomery, compose N. Wales; while S. Wales consists of the shires of Brecknock, Cardigan, Carmarthen, Glamorgan, Radnor, and Pembroke. Except the island Anglesey, which has a level or undulating surface, nearly all Wales, especially its N. half, is mountainous. Snowdon in Carnarvonshire, is 3,557 ft. in height; Cader-Idris, Merionethshire, 3,550 feet; the Brecknock Beacon (S. Wales), 2,862 feet, and many summits rise to between 1,500 and 2,300 feet in elevation. Chief rivers, the Dee, Severn, Wye, Usk, Towy, Teify, Dovy, Conway, and Clwyd, the vales of some of which are very fertile. Lakes are insignificant, that of Bala, the largest, is only 8 m. in length. Principal inlets are, on the W. coast, Carnarvon and Cardigan bays, St Bride's bay, and Milford haven; on the S. Carmarthen and Swansea, separated by the peninsula of Gower, and on the N. the estuary of the Dee, and the harbours of Beaumaris and Holyhead. Principal headlands, Brach-y-Pwll and St David's head. Agriculture is extremely backward. Barley and oats are the chief grains raised; the culture of potatoes and turnips is extending. Farms mostly small, averaging in S. Wales only from 50 to 60 acres, where, however, the tenantry are far better lodged than in the N. Average rent 6s. 8d. per acre. Annual value of real property in 1843, 3,465,718l. Large numbers of cattle are reared for the English markets. The number of sheep is estimated at 1,250,000, and the annual produce of wool at 10,000 packs. A hardy small breed of ponies is reared, especially in the cos. Montgomery and Merioneth. Mining industry is highly important. Iron, copper, lead, silver, slate, limestone, and in the S. large quantities of coal are raised, which last product is extensively exported, and used in large quantities on the spot for smelting both British and foreign ores. In 1840, South Wales had 132 furnaces in operation, consuming annually about 1,436,000 tons of coal, and producing 506,000 tons of iron; and N. Wales 12 furnaces, consuming 110,000 tons of coal, and producing 26,500 tons of iron. The principal iron works are at and around Merthyr-Tydvil, Tredegar, Aberdare, and Rhuabon; at Swansea, large quantities of American & other copper ores are reduced. Manufs. of woollen fabrics, especially of flannel and hosiery, are very generally pursued in the cottages of the peasantry, particularly in N. Wales, where Welsh-wool is the chief mart for these products. The cotton manuf. has extended into some of the N. cos.; and in 1847, 1,860 hands were employed in woollen, cotton, flax, & silk factories. A manuf. of slate articles exists at Bangor. Trade principally in the export of mineral produce, cattle, and woollen goods. Principal ports, Swansea, Newport, Cardiff, Carnarvon, and Beaumaris, besides which, Holyhead is a chief packet-station for communication with Ireland, and Milford is a naval port, and the seat of a government dockyard. Roads through the principality are now generally good; and in the S. are several short railways, and a part of the Ellesmere canal. Wales is in the ecclesiastical prov. of Canterbury, and divided into the 4 bishopricks of Llandaff, St David's, Bangor, and St Asaph. It contains 13 borroughs, besides contributory bors., each of which sends 1 mem. to H. of C., as does each of its cos. The aboriginal Celtic race still retains the Celtic language, and inhabits S. Wales; a mixture of Teutonic & Celtic, N. Wales. Wales was entitled Britannia Secunda by the Romans, who constructed many roads and stations in the country. It maintained a successful struggle against the Saxons, and was not wholly subdued by the Normans until 1282, since which era, the heir apparent of the English throne has always held the title of Prince of Wales. Near it is an obelisk to commemorate a destructive visitation of the plague in 1669, and a public cemetery was laid out here in 1840. The hospital of St Cross, 1 m. In the time of Henry I., it had reached its greatest eminence; but in the reign of Henry VI., it had materially declined; it was however a principal residence of the English sovereigns down to the accession of Geo. I. Henry III. was born here in 1207; & here also Henry VIII. entertained the emperor Charles v.; and their offspring, Mary and Philip, were married at Winchester in 1554.

WÜRTEMBERG (KINGDOM OF), a state of S.W. Germany, between lat. 47° 35' and 49° 35' 30" N., and lon. 8° 15' and 10° 30' E.; bounded E. by Bavaria, S. by the lake of Constance, S.W., W., and N. by Baden; cap. Stuttgart. Length 140 m., breadth 20 to 100 m. It is divided into the circles Neckar, Black Forest, Danube, and Jaxt. Area 7,658 sq. m. Pop. (1846) 1,743,827. The territory belongs to the basins of the Rhine and Danube. Its entire surface is mountainous except in the S. The principal chain is that of the Alps of Swabia, which unites on the S.W. with the Schwarzwald and separates the basins of the Neckar and Danube; the highest points are not more than 3,800 feet. The principal rivers are the Danube and Neckar, the latter of which drains the greater part of the kingdom. The territory is in many places highly picturesque. A portion of the lake of Constance belongs to Würtemberg, and there are many small lakes in the S., the chief of which is the Feder-see. Climate in general temperate and healthy, but variable. Temperature ranges from 77° to 86° in summer, and 5° to 10° Fahr. in winter. The soil is extremely fertile in the valleys of the Tauber, the Neckar and its affls., and on the lake of Constance; the usual grains are raised more than necessary for home consumption. Agriculture has made rapid progress, and there is an excellent agricultural institute at Holsenheim. The potato, introduced in 1710, is now the principal sustenance of  $\frac{1}{3}$ th of the pop. The cultivation of the vine is limited to the valley of the Neckar and the Tauber, and to the shores of the lake of Constance. The Neckar wines are the best; some of the others resemble Rhenish wines. No country in Germany produces fruit in such abundance as Würtemberg. The principal products are apples, pears, prunes, and cherries. Fruit-trees are cultivated over all the territory, but especially in the valley of the Neckar; beetroot is grown for the manufacture of sugar; hemp, lint, tobacco, and hops are raised in small quantities. The Alp and the Schwarzwald are covered with vast forests which yield valuable timber. The rearing of horses, cattle, and sheep, is an important branch of industry; these are in general of good breeds. The principal mineral products are iron and coal, which are abundant, and the working of which, in 1840, employed 330 miners. Silver, copper, cobalt, and lead are found in small quantities; and there are quarries of excellent building stones and marble. Würtemberg has a great many mineral springs; the best frequented baths are those of Wildbad, the only thermal springs in the territory. Salt is an important product, and turf is very abundant. Manufactures are unimportant; they comprise linens, woollens, silks, carpets, hosiery, leather, porcelain, iron & steel goods, and tobacco; breweries and distilleries are numerous. The transit trade is considerable, chiefly by the navigation of the Neckar. A line of railway has been opened from Stuttgart N. to Heilbronn, and another S.E. to Geislingen; and thence S. by Ulm, Biberach, and Ravensburg, to Friedrichshafen on the lake of Constance, the latter portion of which is only in progress. Würtemberg has long been favourably distinguished for the number and excellence of its educational establishments. Each commune and even hamlet has its primary school, attendance at which is obligatory on children between the ages of 6 and 14, and the number at school is in the proportion of 1 in 6 of the pop. The university of Tübingen is one of the most celebrated in Germany; there are infant schools in the cap. and several of the larger towns, and an institution for young ladies founded by Queen Catherine; normal schools, polytechnic and military schools. Würtemberg is a constitutional representative kingdom, governed according to the constitution of 1819, with a diet of 2 chambers. The pop. is almost exclusively German, except a few Jews and some colonies of French Protestants; the majority belong to the evangelical church formed by the union of the Lutherans and reformers in 1823, and only about 1-3d are Roman Catholics—all sects are tolerated. The army consists of 19,170 men in time of war, and 8,020 in time of peace; every male subject is liable to serve from the age of 25 to 31. The citadel of Hohen-zollern is the only fortress. Revenue (1848), 10,869,808 Rhenish florins; expenditure 10,711,210 florins. Debt 31,603,095 florins. In the 15th century the county of Würtemberg in Swabia, was erected into a duchy by the Emp. Maximilian; this was greatly extended by Napoleon, who created it an electorate in 1803, & gave to its sovereign the title of king in 1806.

Except the castle, occupying nearly 4 acres, between the Ouse and Foss, and containing the fine co.-hall and jail, most of the public edifices of interest are in the N. of the city. It has two important banking companies, and it communicates by the Great North England railway with Darlington, Durham, Newcastle; by the York and North Midland way with Sheffield & Derby; & by other railways with Whitby, Hull, Scarborough, &c. Principal capes, Flamborough-head and Spurn-head. Yorkshire is both an agricultural and grazing, and a manufacturing co. of the first rank. Large numbers of horses are bred; and the co. supplies many of the cows used in the London dairies. Sheep have been estimated at 1,200,000, and the annual produce of wool at 2,800 packs. Hogs are numerous, and York is famous for its hams. Properties more subdivided in the N. and W. than in the E. Farms generally small. Average rent in 1810, 16s. 7½d. an acre. About 12,000 acres of common land have been enclosed and rendered arable. Principal crop, wheat. Timber is plentiful, and a large part of the surface is in pasture; though less attention has been paid to cattle-breeding than in the other Ridings. The valuable coal-beds around Leeds, Sheffield, Bradford, and Wakefield, have been a main source of the prosperity of those towns; iron, stone, and lead, at Grassington and Pateley-bridge, are also abundant.
